Mr. STANTON. I submit that the House has had no morning hour. The motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table is not in order until the House has spent one hour in the regular business of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced in the morning that the first business in order was the call of committees for reports, and called the Committee of Elections. After that call by the Chair, the House proceeded to other business; but it was impossible for the Chair to stop the morning hour from running. The Chair, therefore, decides that the morning hour has expired, and that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois is in order.

Mr. STANTON. I submit that the call of committees for reports is in order; and I insist on the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must refer the gentleman from Ohio to the 27th rule.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to; and the question recurred on the motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The joint resolution from the Senate providing for a recess from the 23d of December instant till the 4th of January next, was taken up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the previous question.

Mr. WARREN moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

Mr. WARREN. My object is to get the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolution; and if I can get that, I am willing to withdraw my motion.

Mr. COBB. I ask the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will withdraw the call for the previous question, I will offer an amendment.

Mr. BRANCH. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I want to move that this House adjourn; and I want to move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. REILLY. I move to amend by substituting "Monday" for "Friday."

Mr. SEWARD. That motion is not in order. The first in time is first in order.

The question was taken on the motion that, when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday next; and it was decided in the negative.

The question was next taken on the motion to adjourn; and it was lost.

Mr. WARREN. I call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Banks, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Campbell, Caskie, Chaffee, Chapman, Clark B. Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Warren, White, Wilson, John W. Wright, and Zoll-coffer—88.

So the resolution was passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, merely for the purpose of reference.

Mr. DEAN. I object; and move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at five minutes past five o'clock) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve, m.

IN SENATE.

Ordered, That the petition of William K. Jennings and A. W. Jennings, legal representatives of William Bean; the petition of the heirs of Edward Rudd; the petition of Ann Robinson; the petition of Henry A. Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to the Senate the estimates which have at any time been made for the improvement of rivers and harbors within the State of New York.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator has no objection, I should like to have the resolution amended so as to cover the lakes.

Mr. SEWARD. The estimates for improvements on Lake Erie have already been called for by a resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] The Senator can offer a separate resolution for Michigan and the upper lakes.

Mr. STUART. I will not offer any amendment.

The resolution was agreed to.

EMANCIPATION OF SLAVES.

Mr. FOSTER presented a petition from citizens of Berlin, Connecticut, praying for the adoption of measures for the peaceful extinction of slavery by a fair and ample compensation to the owners of slaves for their manumission; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MASON subsequently said: A few minutes since a petition was introduced by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, which escaped my attention at the time. It has been called to it since. It is from certain citizens of Connecticut, asking that a law may be passed for the peaceable extinction of slavery, by a fair and ample compensation to the slaveholders; and, on his motion, it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I have said to that honorable Senator that my present impressions are very strong, for reasons that I do not wish to detain the Senate now with assigning, against such reference; and I move, therefore, that the order to refer be reconsidered, and I shall ask that, for the present, the petition lie on the table.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection, certainly, to the petition lying on the table until any examination may be made. The petition, I am certain, is not obnoxious to any section of the Union. It is not sectional in its character, and will not meet any other opposition except that which arises to any kind of measure for the same object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves to reconsider the vote by which the petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I now move that the petition be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution in regard to clerks of committees. We have begun our labors in the committee rooms, but there is no provision for the aid of our clerks.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BENJAMIN on Monday last:

Resolved, That each of the standing committees of the Senate, enumerated in the 34th rule, be authorized to employ a clerk, with the exception of the four following committees, which shall not be entitled to a clerk, to wit:

1. The Committee on the Library.
2. The Committee on Engrossed Bills.
3. The Committee on Enrolled Bills.
4. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and that the clerks so employed shall receive a compensation of six dollars per diem during the time of their actual service.

The pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. EVANS, to add, "except the Committees on Finance, Claims, and Printing, whose clerks shall receive an annual compensation of $1,850 each."

Mr. BENJAMIN. So far as I am authorized, if I have the authority to do so, I will accept the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, and make it a part of my resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution as modified.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have an amendment to offer as a substitute for the resolution. It is to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert:

That the clerks of all the standing committees shall be permanent; and the clerks of the Committees on Finance, Printing, and Claims shall receive an annual salary of $1,800. The clerks of all the other committees shall receive an annual salary of $1,500; and all clerks of committees shall, during the adjournment of the Senate, have charge of all books and papers of the committees, and be responsible for the safe keeping of the same, and it shall be their duty to reply to all communications relating to business before the committees of which they are clerks respectively.

I have no disposition to debate this question. It has been open for some time past, and the Senate have been unable to agree about it. I will merely state that my object is to make the clerks who may be employed by the committees permanent, thereby avoiding the necessity at the opening of each Congress of appointing a clerk; and thus getting rid of that impotency which is so unpleasant to Senators in reference to making selections among clerks. I think if a committee is entitled to a clerk he should be permanent, and be responsible for the business and papers referred to it. That is my object in offering the amendment.

I have no objection to giving the clerks of the three committees, who really have the most work to perform, $1,800 a year; and I think $1,500 is as small a sum as we really can offer to those who perform these duties for the other committees. If any Senator thinks $1,500 is too much, let him name a less sum. I believe the business of the body would be greatly promoted by making the clerks permanent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inquire of the Senator from Indiana whether he designs to make no exception? His amendment gives clerks to all the committees. There are four committees which, by the resolution offered by the Senator from Louisiana, are to have no clerks, and ought to have none.

Mr. BRIGHT. My resolution does not contemplate that they shall have them. It provides that such as are entitled to clerks now shall have them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the amendment be read again. I think it makes no exception.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Last session a select committee of the members of this body was appointed to revise the rule with reference to standing committees and their clerks, and they reported a resolution on the subject. That resolution provided that no clerks should be allowed to two committees not named in the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana—the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office. That matter was discussed at considerable length during the special session of the Senate, and a vote was taken on allowing a clerk to one of those committees—the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds—and the Senate decided that that committee did not need a clerk. I do not feel disposed to renew the discussion on that point unless others should do so; but I propose to make a motion that those committees be struck out, simply because it was so decided by the Senate, and because I became perfectly convinced that those committees did not need a clerk.

With regard to the proposition now offered by the Senator from Indiana, I think it must be obvious to most of the members of the Senate who have been on committees, that there can be no possible necessity for permanent clerks, except for the committees that are excepted by the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, which has been adopted by the Senator from Louisiana. The select committee rather came to the conclusion that there were several other standing committees which did not need a clerk; that the custom of employing a clerk had grown into an abuse, but it is an abuse to which we have become so familiarized that it is almost impossible now to prevent it. Every chairman of a committee (if it is a committee of any importance at all) likes very well to have the privilege of appointing a clerk, whose principal duties are, as I understand from my observation, to wait upon the chairman and other members of the committee more or less, with regard to franking documents, and all those things which it is very convenient to have a clerk to do. A suggestion that was made here at the last Congress, I think by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. Butler,] was, that it would be better and more consistent for each member of the Senate to have a clerk, and then we should be carrying out the system. There is no particular reason why these clerks should be appropriated particularly to the chairmen of the committees, but that is pretty much the result now. However, I dare say if our side of the Senate should get into power, they would like to have the same privilege, and I am not disposed to quarrel on that subject. I know it is considered invidious to attempt to change a well-established custom, and I feel rather disposed to yield to what has been the ordinary course of the Senate in that particular, although I think it is a great abuse. But I see no reason in the world why we should now go further, and make permanent offices of the clerkships to the committees. There are many committees here which, as I said before, hardly need a clerk, and certainly there can be nothing for them to do during the recess.

The amendment says it shall be their duty to take care of the papers. Why, sir, the papers will take care of themselves when they are locked up in a drawer. They are to answer all letters they may receive on the business of the committees. It is not probable that there will be half a dozen during the recess. That is, if I may be allowed to say so, merely giving color to the object of making permanent clerks of all these gentlemen.

But it has been suggested to me, and I have no doubt it is true, that the gentlemen who come here as clerks to the committees generally come from a distance. They are friends of the chairmen, who are brought to stay here during the session, and there is no sort of difficulty in finding them. There are applications numerous enough for these posts. I presume you could find forty for each clerkship to exist merely during the sessions of the Senate. There can be nothing of necessity, and, in my judgment, nothing of propriety, in making fifteen or twenty permanent officers, at a salary of $1,500 a year each, when during one year the Senate is in session but three months, and there is, in reality, nothing for a clerk to do in the recess. It is making so many sinecures, and I do not think the Senate can excuse itself for passing a resolution of that description, which is certainly a new feature in the whole business of the Senate's proceedings.

I happened to be a member of Congress some dozen years ago, and at that time there were but three or four committees, either in the House of Representatives or the Senate, that were allowed clerks at all. The effort was made frequently, and it was very often rejected, to allow a committee to have a clerk. It was not considered necessary except in two or three cases. A clerk then was allowed to the Committee of Ways and Means, and the Committee of Claims in the other House, and, perhaps, to one or two others. It has kept growing until now every committee which has anything at all to do, has a clerk during the whole of the session; and the latest move is to have fifteen or twenty officers saddled on the Government for the whole year, with really nothing to do. I dislike as much as any one to appear in this case to object to what may seem to be agreeable to other gentlemen of the Senate; but I consider it my duty to call the attention of members of the Senate to it, and having done that, I have no more to say on the subject. I claim the privilege of voting against it.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not propose to discuss the question. I incline to adopt the amendment of the honorable Senator from Indiana, with a change, naming such committees as, in the judgment of the Senate, ought to be entitled to clerks. Perhaps I might differ as to the amount of compensation, either as to some of those to whom the highest compensation is allowed, as some of those to whom he proposes to allow $1,500 only. As to the relative labor of clerks of committees, we might all differ. In my judgment it facilitates the business of the Senate though there may be something of abuse in it, to have clerks to committees. I would allow clerks to all the committees except three, the Committees on Engrossed Bills and Enrolled Bills, for whom clerks are clearly unnecessary; and I think the Committee on the Library does not require a clerk. I am a member of that committee. With these exceptions, I think there is sufficient business for the clerks to the other committees, and the appointment of clerks for them would facilitate the transaction of business.

I will not enter into the question as to the propriety of allowing a clerk to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I am no longer chairman of that committee, and feel now no delicacy in relation to the matter. I can only state, as the result of my own experience, that that committee ought to be entitled to a clerk, if you give one to any committee at all. I do not pretend to say its duties are as laborious as those of the Committee on Finance, or some other committees of the Senate; but I think the business of the Senate would be facilitated by allowing a clerk to that committee, as well as to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, and every other committee, except the three which I have named. I shall be satisfied, however, with any judgment of the Senate. I hope my friend from Indiana will alter his amendment so as to name such committees as he purposes to allow clerks to, with a salary of $1,500.

I do not see any great objection to making these clerks permanent. Whether you appoint them for the session or permanently, you must allow a sufficient sum to secure the services of persons who are trustworthy and competent to perform the duties. Whether you could expect to have them under the sum named in the amendment, is not for me to say: it is for the Senate to determine. I should have preferred rather a lower amount; but I am perfectly satisfied with any sum the Senate thinks right.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware; and the shortest mode of doing it, will be to except the four committees referred to in the original resolution—the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the Committees on Enrolled Bills, on Engrossed Bills, and on the Library.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The closing feature of the amendment which constitutes the clerks agents to keep the records, I think will involve the Senate and the country in some difficulty. There are numerous committees; and in the first place, perhaps not one man in ten thousand will know to whom or where to apply for information if he wants any, in the recess of Congress in connection with the custody of those records. But I can imagine, and I venture to say many Senators can imagine, many things that might result injuriously to the public service. Suppose, as is sometimes the case, that we employ a clerk who does not pay that attention which is necessary to the keeping of the records, or suppose a clerk happens to die during the recess, leaving his records where they are inaccessible to anybody else; I ask the Senate what would be the consequence if the numerous valuable papers, especially to the parties interested, could not be found? I can imagine many other cases where serious difficulty might grow out of the fact of constituting them the keepers of the records and papers of the various committees.

I will suggest to the Senator from Indiana that it would perhaps be safer to require the records to be kept as heretofore, giving the committee clerks at all times access to them. Then we should have a head who would have the control, and no difficulty could occur. Many of these papers are essential to parties who have claims pending before Congress. Some of these clerks, as has been remarked before, live remote from here, and if you constitute them keepers of the records, some of them will deposit them with some friend. They will not remain here all the time, but will necessarily be absent. I suggest to the Senate and to the Senator from Indiana, if it would not be safer to say that the records shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Senate, but shall be at all times accessible to the committee clerks. It appears to me that would be more in accordance with prudence and propriety. I take it for granted that the records would be safely kept; but we can all imagine a state of affairs where they would not be, as owing to a providential event such as the death of a clerk leaving no one acquainted with the place where he deposited his records. That difficulty might occur. It seems to me it would be safer to deposit the records as heretofore, but at the same time give the clerks access to them.

Mr. MASON. I have been generally opposed to making these clerkships permanent. I think the only exception should be the Committee on Finance. But Senators know that we are really harassed at every session about some adjustment being made in reference to these clerkships. I think we had better end it. I am willing to concede my objection, and more especially as there does seem to be a propriety when the Senate is a continuous body that these officers should have charge of the books, papers, &c., of the committees, and be ready to act. I submit to the Senate that it is really a desideratum to get rid of this branch of the public service, for we are harassed by it at every session in various forms.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I did not think I could be provoked to say another word on this question, of which I am heartily sick; but what has just fallen from the Senator from Virginia, I think, makes it incumbent on me to submit a few remarks to the Senate.

The very evil of which he complains had become so intolerable in this body, that at the last session a special committee was raised on my motion, which was composed of several of the oldest and most experienced Senators of the body, who took this whole subject into consideration, and submitted to the Senate a report by which the evil was nipped in the bud. We proposed a standing rule of the Senate which provided for this whole subject and which would control it in all future time, enabling us to get rid of this constant and harassing solicitation from the clerks of our committees. It pleased the Senate to lay a portion of that report—the portion which regarded the compensation of the clerks—on the table, and we adjourned without acting. The resolution now before the Senate is nothing more than that portion of the 34th rule of the Senate, as suggested by that special committee, which was laid upon the table at the last session.

The Senate's special committee at that time came unanimously to the conclusion that there was great abuse in this matter, and as liberal a report was brought in as its members could be induced to frame. It was considered by many members of the Senate too liberal.

In relation to taking care of the records and papers of the committees, why, sir, I am astonished to hear gentlemen make such suggestions. We all know that, at the close of every session, all the papers in the committee rooms are returned to the Secretary of the Senate, who takes charge of them until the next session; and why we should want a clerk in every little room about the building, to take charge of a few bundles of papers, passes my comprehension. It is clear this is a mere pretext for making the clerks permanent. There is no necessity for it. This body of permanent officers that is to be added to the Senate must, in the conscience and conviction of every member, be known to be unnecessary. If the object is to provide for friends and dependents, let us say so openly; and let us pass a resolution to provide for the friends of the chairmen of the different committees of the body, by allowing them a permanent salary. That is the object, and must be the only object, of any such proposition. We have ample means to have all the work of the body done by competent clerks, paying them for their service during the session when they are wanted. During the vacation they are no more wanted here than they are wanted at the residence of any Senator. They have nothing to do, and can have nothing whatever to do, then, with the exception of the two or three committees specially excepted by the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

I hope we shall not do this thing. I think we are increasing the contingent expenses of this body greatly too much, and it is time we should satisfy the just expectations of the country in the mode of conducting our business here, and not be constantly increasing the number of our officers and increasing their salaries, for no other purpose than favoritism—certainly not for doing the business of the Senate. It is impossible that any member can entertain the conviction that these officers are necessary for the business of the Senate. The Senator from Virginia himself, in sustaining the proposition, gives us to understand that he does it to get rid of importunities and annoyances. I am not willing to put my vote on any such ground as that. Let us do our duty as public men regardless of these petty annoyances. Let us give a vote at once that will settle this matter on its proper footing and put an end to this debate that occurs at every session of the Senate.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Is the question before the Senate on the substitute of the Senator from Indiana?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert what has been read.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I concur very much in the argument of the Senator from Louisiana. I am sure that, during the session of Congress, clerks to the committees are very essential, and I am willing to conform my vote to this belief. The resolution offered by the Senator from Louisiana embodies my views more fully than that offered by the Senator from Indiana. During the session of Congress, I believe that nearly all of the committees should be entitled to a clerk; but after we leave here and go home, do we not all know there are sufficient officers here to attend to public business? Are not our documents forwarded to us during the long recess? Where, then, is the necessity for entailing on the public service the heavy expense of paying permanent salaries to this class of officers?

I cannot agree with my friend from Indiana in sustaining the proposition he has submitted. I see no earthly necessity, at the long or short session, for having these permanent clerks. There are two or three committees which should be entitled to permanent clerks; but those are excepted in the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana.

It is proposed here that, for nine months, when we have all the agents necessary to attend to the public business and forward our documents, we shall have fifteen or sixteen clerks; and not only that, but we are to take from the Secretary of the Senate, during the recess, the responsibility now devolved upon him, and to commit to the custody of these clerks the records of the country. This is an innovation which I am unwilling to make.

I am willing to vote for the resolution offered by the Senator from Louisiana, because every one conversant with the routine of business knows that it is physically impossible for a large number of us, with the vast amount of business required at our hands during the session of Congress, to transmit all the public documents that come to us, and which should be scattered throughout the country. They perform valuable and essential service in doing that. Those documents are published by Congress; they are designed to be disseminated throughout the country; and it is imposing too much labor on any Senator to require him to attend to that, and do all the duties incident to his station in the Senate. I am, therefore, in favor of allowing to the respective committees, contemplated by the resolution, the clerks necessary; but I am unwilling to create salaried officers, and more unwilling to commit to them the custody and keeping of all our records, and taking the responsibility from the officer who has had the custody of them since the formation of the Government. In my opinion, it is an unsafe and dangerous precedent.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PEARCE. Several Senators have anticipated what I proposed to say when I first rose. I only desire, now, to call the attention of the Senate to the last clause of the amendment, as, if I read it aright, it proposes that all memorials and other papers, which have been referred to committees, shall be left in the custody of the clerks during the recess of the Senate. Is not that the object of the amendment?

Mr. BRIGHT. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the amendment I offered this morning is precisely the resolution offered by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] since deceased, which passed the Senate at the last Congress, but subsequently was reconsidered and left among the unfinished business. At that time the Senate seemed disposed to adopt the resolution, and I supposed, when I offered it this morning, there would be really no objection to it. I am very willing to withdraw so much of it as provides for committing the papers to the keeping of the clerks during the recess.

Mr. PEARCE. If the Senator will so modify the amendment it will obviate the necessity of my saying a word more.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will strike that out. I submit now the simple proposition, whether the Senate will employ permanent clerks for the committees, which the Senator from Louisiana, as chairman of the special committee, reported were entitled to clerks; or whether at the opening of each Congress we shall be importuned by persons who desire these places. The amendment, as modified, will read:

That the clerks of all the standing committees shall be permanent; and the clerks of the Committees on Finance, Printing, and Claims, shall receive an annual salary of $1,500; the clerks of all the other committees, except the Committees on the Library, on Engrossed Bills, on Enrolled Bills, and to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, shall receive an annual salary of $1,500.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 7, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Davis, Douglas, Mason, Pugh, and Sebastian—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Green, Hale, Hamilton, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Seward, Simmons, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—35.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana, as modified.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have an amendment to offer. The resolution provides that these clerks shall be paid a per diem during their actual service. I have an idea that the committees may direct the clerk to be employed during the vacation, and so make them permanent after all. I wish to have their pay confined to the time of their employment during the sessions of Congress. My amendment is to strike out the words "during the time of their actual service," and insert "during the sessions of Congress."

Mr. BENJAMIN. I accept that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution as modified.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Let it be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That each of the standing committees of the Senate enumerated in the 34th rule, be authorized to employ a clerk, with the exception of the four following committees, which shall not be entitled to a clerk, to wit:

1. The Committee on the Library;
2. The Committee on Engrossed Bills;
3. The Committee on Enrolled Bills;
4. And the Committee to Audit and Control the Continuing Expenses of the Senate;

And that the clerks so employed shall receive a compensation of six dollars per diem, during the sessions of Congress, except the Committees on Finance, Claims, and Printing, whose clerks shall receive an annual compensation of $1,850 each.

The resolution was adopted.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. C. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the Speaker of the House had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 13) to authorize the issue of Treasury notes; and it was, therefore, signed by the Vice President.

Afterwards, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed the bill.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, being the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to refer so much of the President's message as relates to the affairs of Kansas Territory to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, as stated by the Chair, the subject immediately before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Illinois to refer that portion of the President's message which relates to the affairs of Kansas Territory to the Committee on Territories; but the subject which is before the Senate for discussion, is the question of admitting Kansas as an independent and sovereign State into this confederacy of States, under and by virtue of a constitution recently formed at Leecompton. Those who have preceded me in the debate, or at least some of them, felt embarrassed by the magnitude and importance of this question. I freely confess that it is one of the most important questions that can engage the attention of Congress. It is neither more nor less than the exercise of that power of Congress under the Constitution, which creates a new sovereignty, brings it into being, and adopts it as one of the States of this Confederacy. And when we reflect how many men, distinguished in the public service for their great abilities, have expressed themselves against the extension of the number of States in this Union, and have warned their fellow-citizens against its consequences, lest the fabric itself should fall by its own weight, we may well consider this the most important function that the Constitution has clothed Congress with the power of exercising. In discussing a subject of such a character, I certainly shall bring to it all the consideration that I have been able to bestow. I shall do it with that respect which is due to the subject, and especially the respect due to those who differ from me in this body. If, in the course of this debate, I shall say anything which can offend the most sensitive of those who may differ from me, I shall regret it vastly more than he.

The power of Congress to admit States into the Union is the question which, in my judgment, lies at the very foundation of this discussion. The Constitution of the United States, in the third section of the fourth article, provides that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." The only limitations to the exercise of the power are found in the language that follows: "but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress." It was well said by Mr. Attorney General Butler, in the Arkansas case, that the power of Congress over this question is plenary. From the very nature of the question, it must be. It is subject only to the limitations provided in that article; and whenever a question is presented as to the admission of a State into this Union, it must necessarily be determined by the circumstances which surround and govern that particular case. Why, sir, it is a power which authorizes the admission of foreign States, as well as those carved out of our own dominion; and this single statement will show to the mind of any gentleman, at a glance, that precedents, former laws of Congress, never can, and never ought to be, resorted to for the purpose of determining the power or the propriety in a particular case. I use the term "propriety" with a purpose. The power to admit a State necessarily carries with it the power to decline to admit; and when I hear gentlemen talking about the necessity, the imperious obligation that rests upon Congress to admit a State under a particular specified set of circumstances, I confess, sir, it is a doctrine that is not in accordance with my views of the Constitution. It may be very proper, for instance, to refuse to admit a State to-day, and it may be quite the reverse one year from to-day. Congress, and Congress alone, under the power conferred upon it by the Constitution, is to determine, not only the question whether a State shall be admitted at all, but it is equally clothed with authority to determine when it shall be admitted.

In connection with this subject, enabling acts have been discussed. They have an importance in a respect to which, by-and-by, I shall allude; but that an enabling act is necessary, indispensably necessary, in order to the admission of a State into this Union, I never heard any man pretend. It is not made necessary by the Constitution itself; it has not been held necessary in any case that I know of, by the Congress of the United States; and when you come to consider the fact to which I have alluded, that the power exists to admit foreign as well as domestic States, you are forced to the conclusion at once, that no enabling act can be regarded as of indispensable necessity.

Sir, perhaps one of the most unfortunate results flowing from party discussions of great constitutional questions, is the engendering of opinions and the enunciation of doctrines not only novel in their character, but many of them dangerous in their tendency to the permanency of our institutions. When I heard the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] giving his views of the effect of an enabling act, I confess I was forcibly struck with the consideration to which I have just referred. He said that an enabling act, giving the assent of Congress to the formation of a new State, conferred on that State the authority, if Congress refused to admit it, to set up an independent sovereignty on its own account, out of the Union. Can that be true? Can it be true that the Constitution of the United States has conferred on Congress the power to do an act under the Constitution which shall overturn the instrument and destroy the Government? In other words, and more concisely, is it true that the Constitution confers upon Congress the power to commit suicide and destroy the Government? The idea of an independent State formed under the Constitution, and yet out of the Union, is an idea which cannot bear the light of investigation.

This makes it necessary to consider for a moment what is the purpose and character of an enabling act. The character of an enabling act is simply to authorize the people of a Territory to form a constitution and State government, for the purpose of being admitted into the Union, and for no other purpose. It is useful and safe, and, I think, ought to be adopted as a general rule; because it enables Congress to define the boundaries of the new State, to require that the constitution, when formed, shall be submitted to the people, and generally to exercise a proper control over the whole subject. What is its language? Entirely consonant with its character—to form a constitution in obedience to the law of Congress, and submit it to Congress for the purposes of admission as a member of the Confederacy, and to abide by the result. If Congress refuses the admission, that is an end of the effect of the enabling act. The Senator from Missouri suggested that there was danger, permanent and paramount danger, to the interests of this country, by adopting the policy of passing enabling acts; and that it was better to give the assent after the constitution was formed, than to give it before. Whether given before or afterwards, it is but the assent of Congress that the Territory may be admitted as an independent sovereignty into the Union, but not made a State out of the Union.

What, then, is the great leading and fundamental principle which should control the action of Congress in the admission of a State into the Union? It is simply that the constitution of the new State shall be of a character not dangerous to our institutions; and that the people of the new State shall be satisfied with it, and ask for admission under it: that is all. The power of Congress is to "admit" a State into the Union, not to coerce it. Congress would be but the veriest tyrant that ever existed on the face of the globe, if it had a power to coerce a State into the Union contrary to the will of the people composing that State. It lies, then, at the foundation of the question, as it does at the foundation of personal liberty, that Congress shall be satisfied—satisfied beyond a reasonable dispute—that the people composing the State ask to be admitted. It should never be forgotten that it is a mere consent on our part—nothing more. The State proposes admission and Congress gives its consent.

Now, sir, all that I have to do on this question to-day is to apply the principles I have thus laid down, to the question of admitting Kansas into the Union under the Leecompton constitution. This renders it necessary that I should briefly advert to the past history and the present condition of the most unfortunate people of that Territory, politically considered. And first, in regard to the Kansas act. The country, for years, had been agitated in respect to the power of Congress to legislate on slavery in the Territories. Various opinions had been entertained and expressed. A portion of the people, and of the members of Congress, held that Congress possessed unlimited power over that question while the Territory remained in a territorial condition—that Congress possessed the power to exclude slavery or to adopt it. Others contended that Congress possessed the power to exclude but not to adopt. Others held, like my late distinguished colleague, now the Secretary of State, [Mr. CASS], that Congress possessed no power over that subject whatever, but that the people of the Territories possessed full power over it during their territorial condition. Others, again, contended that neither Congress nor the people, while the Territory remained such, possessed any power whatever over the question, except to protect such property in slaves as should be carried into it.

With this diversity of opinion, entering, as it did, into the political discussions throughout the country and in Congress; endangering, as many good men thought, not only the peace and happiness of the people, but the safety and permanency of our institutions, and with a view, so far as the Democratic party was concerned, of settling it on some fair basis, the Kansas-Nebraska act was introduced. What was done by it? Language was employed that should confer on the people of the Territory the sole and exclusive control over this question while they remained a Territory, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. I never heard any gentleman pretend that the use of those words, "subject only to the Constitution of the United States," changed the law in any respect; but this was the intention: whatever power Congress possessed should be conferred upon the Territory. Whatever power the people of the Territory possessed, of course they retained. If the power to legislate in respect to slavery rested in either place, the Kansas-Nebraska act conferred it on or left it with the people of the Territory. If it did not rest in either, then, of course, nothing was carried to the people by virtue of the act.

But, Mr. President, did anybody ever dream, while the Kansas-Nebraska act was under consideration here, that we were conferring any power on the people of the Territory when they came to form a constitution and ask admission into the Union? Was there a word uttered in debate, and has there been any considerable amount of opinion since the great Missouri question was agitated, that Congress possesses any power to control the action of a Territory in forming a constitution, and asking admission into the Union, as to what institutions it would establish? I think not. I should like to know if there is an honorable Senator here to-day who believes that if the Kansas-Nebraska act had been repealed before the constitutional convention at Leecompton sat, the people of Kansas Territory, in framing their constitution, would not have had the entire right to have said whether slavery should have existed within its borders or not?

If this be true, and I humbly submit to the consideration of Senators that it is true, what then becomes of all these wire-drawn arguments out of the Kansas-Nebraska act—seeking at one instant to show that it is an enabling act, and at another instant that it has conferred on that people a right they never had before—to adopt their own mode in framing a constitution? Why, sir, they had it without the act. If that section of the Nebraska act had been repealed a year ago, so long as that people were left in an organized form of government, they had the right to ask to be admitted into the Union, and it was for Congress to say whether they should be admitted or not.

Again, sir, the Senator from Missouri, with that skill in debate which gratified all of us who were attentive observers, in a sort of hand-to-hand scuffle with my friend from Illinois, said to him, this mode of getting up a constitutional convention, and this mode of submitting it, is, on the part of the people of Kansas, their own way. I regretted to see that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER,] and the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH,] had taken what my friend from Missouri considered a mere skillful weapon in debate, and laid it down as a fundamental principle. Had the Kansas-Nebraska act, in using that language, any reference to the mode and manner of executing it? None at all. It related to the character of the institutions, and not to the mode and manner of exercising their right in forming their institutions. The language of the act was, that Congress would neither legislate slavery into any Territory or any State, nor exclude it therefrom; but would leave the people perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. Does that mean anything more—did anybody before ever dream that it meant anything more—than to say what should be the character of the institutions? Never.

Yet, it is urged that it is an enabling act, and that, forsooth, they have got some power in virtue of that act which was never conferred on a Territory before. It has been found out, too, that there is language in that act giving to the Legislature the power to legislate on all rightful subjects. But both are unfounded. Why, sir, we began as far back as 1804, when we organized the Louisiana Territory, to tell the people of that Territory that they might legislate on all rightful subjects of legislation. You will find it in the Wisconsin act; you will find it in the Iowa act, and doubtless in many others. But is it a rightful subject of territorial legislation to destroy itself? I have undertaken to show that Congress has no power to destroy this Confederacy by giving its consent to an independent State out of the Union; and I repeat now, that no territorial legislative body can have any right or authority to adopt a species of legislation which shall destroy itself.

But again, suppose Congress simply authorizes a legislative body to be formed in a Territory; does anybody pretend that it may not legislate on all rightful subjects of legislation without any specification of powers? Is it not true, legally and logically, that the effect of an enumeration of powers is to limit that enumeration? The largest powers that can be conferred are conferred in general terms. To establish a territorial government, authorize the election of a Legislature, and clothe them with power to legislate for the Territory, is a much larger authority than is conferred by a legislative grant enumerating the powers granted, because the enumeration of certain powers excludes the right to exercise any other. It will be found, on looking into the history of the legislation of Congress on this subject of Territories, that enumerated powers have been used for that purpose, and for that purpose alone. They have been prohibited from interfering with the lands of the United States within their borders. They have been prohibited from taxing non-residents at a greater rate than residents, and in some other particulars. The enumerations have been to restrict, and not to enlarge their powers.

I have stated what was the purpose, object, and effect of the Kansas-Nebraska act. Was that act without an effect and without a meaning? Has it no legitimate operation on this question? Certainly it has, and it was for that very reason that I felt myself bound to say, on the reading of the President's message here, and to say it not only with respect to the position that Mr. Buchanan occupies, but with a respect for him equal to that entertained by any gentleman in this body, that if I could agree with the reasoning of the President I might agree with his conclusions. Let me now state some of the grounds why I found myself and still find myself unable to agree with him.

The present history of Kansas is perhaps better stated by the President than it could be stated by myself. He says:

"It is unnecessary to state in detail the alarming condition of the Territory of Kansas at the time of my inauguration. The opposing parties then stood in hostile array against each other, and any accident might have relighted the flames of civil war. Besides, at this critical moment, Kansas was left without a Governor by the resignation of Governor Geary."

"On the 19th of February previous, the Territorial Legislature had passed a law providing for the election of delegates, on the third Monday of June, to a convention to meet on the first Monday of September, for the purpose of framing a constitution preparatory to admission into the Union. This law was in the main fair and just; and it is to be regretted that all the qualified electors had not registered themselves, and voted under its provisions."

"At the time of election for delegates, an extensive organization existed in the Territory, whose avowed object it was, if need be, to put down the lawful government by force, and to establish a government of their own under the so-called Topeka constitution. The persons attached to this revolutionary organization abstained from taking any part in the election."

"The act of the Territorial Legislature had omitted to provide for submitting to the people the constitution which might be framed by the convention; and in the excited state of public feeling throughout Kansas an apprehension extensively prevailed that a design existed to force upon them a constitution in relation to slavery against their will. In this emergency it became my duty, as it was my unquestionable right, having in view the union of all good citizens in support of the territorial laws, to express an opinion on the true construction of the provisions concerning slavery contained in the organic act of Congress of the 30th May, 1854. Congress declared it to be 'the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way.' Under it Kansas, 'when admitted as a State,' was to 'be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission.'"

"Did Congress mean by this language that the delegates elected to frame a constitution should have authority finally to decide the question of slavery, or did they intend by leaving it to the people that the people of Kansas themselves should decide this question by a direct vote? On this subject I confess I had never entertained a serious doubt, and, therefore, in my instructions to Governor Walker of the 28th March last, I merely said that when 'a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence.'"

"In expressing this opinion it was far from my intention to interfere with the decision of the people of Kansas, either for or against slavery. From this I have always carefully abstained. Intrusted with the duty of taking care that the laws be faithfully executed, my only desire was, that the people of Kansas should furnish to Congress the evidence required by the organic act, whether for or against slavery; and in this manner smooth their passage into the Union. In emerging from the condition of territorial dependence into that of a sovereign State, it was their duty, in my opinion, to make known their will by the votes of the majority, on the direct question whether this important domestic institution should or should not continue to exist. Indeed, this was the only possible mode in which their will could be authentically ascertained."

"The election of delegates to a convention must necessarily take place in separate districts. From this cause it may readily happen, as has often been the case, that a majority of the people of a State or Territory are on one side of a question, whilst a majority of the representatives from the several districts into which it is divided may be upon the other side. This arises from the fact that in some districts delegates may be elected by small majorities, whilst in others those of different sentiments may receive majorities sufficiently great not only to overcome the votes given for the former, but to leave a large majority of the whole people in direct opposition to a majority of the delegates. Besides, our history proves that influences may be brought to bear on the representative sufficiently powerful to induce him to disregard the will of his constituents. The truth is, that no other authentic and satisfactory mode exists of ascertaining the will of a majority of the people of any State or Territory on an important and exciting question, like that of slavery in Kansas, except by leaving it to a direct vote. How wise, then, was it for Congress to pass over all subordinate and intermediate agencies, and proceed directly to the source of all legitimate power under our institutions?"

For four years, ever since the Territory of Kansas was organized, the greatest amount of strife, of violence, of bloodshed, of murder, has been continuously rife there. Under these circumstances, what was to be expected of an irregular convention, one got up by the legislative authority of the Territory—a legislative authority which was set at defiance by a large portion of the people—one which they had resolved they would not recognize, and scarcely acquiesce in? But, as it was done, how was it done? It turns out, on examination, that in half the Territory no opportunity was afforded to the people to vote for delegates to the convention at all. The people in half the Territory have never been heard on this question. Can it be expected, then, that they will abide by the decision of the convention? Can it be expected that a people who have never been heard on the question of whether they will be admitted into this Union or not, shall submit to be forced into the Union? Sir, it never can be expected. In regard to this point, the President, in his message, says:

"The convention to frame a constitution for Kansas met on the first Monday of September last. They were called together by virtue of an act of the Territorial Legislature, whose lawful existence had been recognized by Congress in different forms and by different enactments. A large proportion of the citizens of Kansas did not think proper to register their names and to vote at the election for delegates; but an opportunity to do this having been fairly afforded, their refusal to avail themselves of their right could in no manner affect the legality of the convention."

I admit the truth of the President's proposition that if a full and fair opportunity had been given to the people of the Territory to vote for delegates to the convention, their refusal to do so could, in no manner, be taken advantage of by them; but what is the fact in reference to that point? Governor Walker in his recent address, in treating of this point, uses the language which I will read, and Mr. Stanton, the acting Governor of the Territory, in communicating with the Territorial Legislature at its present session, says the same thing. Governor Walker says:

"I have heretofore discussed this subject mainly on the question that conventions are not sovereign, and cannot rightfully make a State constitution without submission to the vote of the people for ratification or rejection; yet surely even those who differ with me on this point must concede, especially under the Kansas-Nebraska bill, it is only such conventions can be called sovereign as have been truly elected by the people and represent their will. On reference, however, to my address of the 16th September last, on the tax-qualification question—a copy of which was immediately transmitted to you for the information of the President and Cabinet—it is evident that the Leecompton convention was not such a body. That convention had vital, not technical defects in the very substance of its organization under the territorial law, which could only be cured, in my judgment, as set forth in my inaugural and other addresses, by the submission of the constitution for ratification or rejection by the people."

"On reference to the Territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken and the voters registered; and when this was completed the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give and (by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. This result was superinduced by the fact that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty by law of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last. These officers, from want of funds, as they allege, neglected or refused to take any census or make any registry in these counties, and therefore they were entirely disfranchised, and could not and did not give a single vote at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention."

And here I wish to call attention to the distinction, which will appear in my inaugural address, in reference to those counties where the voters were fairly registered and did not vote. In such counties, where a full and free opportunity was given to register and vote, and they did not choose to exercise that privilege, the question is very different from those counties where there was no census or registry, and no vote was given or could be given, however anxious the people might be to participate in the election of delegates to the convention. Nor could it be said these counties acquiesced, for wherever they endeavored, by a subsequent census or registry of their own, to supply this defect, occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention. I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention, in any one of these counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties in which there was no census constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory, and these fifteen counties in which there was no registry gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th of November last. If, then, sovereignty can be delegated, and conventions, as such, are sovereign—which I deny—surely it must be only in such cases as when such conventions are chosen by the people, which we have seen was not the case as regards the late Lecompton convention. It was for this, among other reasons, that in my inaugural, and other addresses, I insisted that the constitution should be submitted to the people by the convention, as the only means of curing this vital defect in its organization."

It seems, then, that the President of the United States has based his views in favor of the authority of the convention on the fact that the people of the Territory in electing it had a full and a fair opportunity to vote; but an examination of the facts and the history of the transaction shows they had no opportunity whatever to vote; and the further fact appears that when the people, with an honest desire to participate in this election, had a registry and census of their own made, and voted for and elected delegates, and those delegates asked for admission into the constitutional convention, the members of that body rejected them because they were not elected in accordance with the territorial law.

Sir, how does it appear, how can it appear, that the people of the Territory of Kansas have been properly heard through the delegates to the convention, when one half of the people have had no opportunity to vote at all? This, I think, may well be considered by Congress a vital defect. On this point I beg leave to submit an argument, published in the Washington Union, on the 7th of July last, to prove that no such authority as is now claimed for it could exist on the part of the convention, and that it would be unsafe and unjust to allow Kansas to be admitted into the Union under the action of that convention without a submission of the constitution to the people. The Union, on the 7th of July, said:

"We repeat that the constitution of Kansas must come from the people of Kansas. Other power to make such an instrument there is not under heaven.

"But the Georgia convention, without denying this great principle, seems to think that the constitution of Kansas ought not to be submitted to a direct vote of the people in their primary capacity. We admit that this is not in all cases a sine qua non. It is a fair presumption (if there be no circumstances to repel it) that a convention of delegates chosen by the people will act in accordance with the will of their constituents. When, therefore, there is no serious dispute upon the constitution, either in the convention or among the people, the power of the delegates alone may put it in operation. But such is not the case in Kansas. The most violent struggle this country ever saw upon the most important issue which the constitution is to determine, has been going on there for several years between parties so evenly balanced that both claim the majority, and so hostile to one another that numerous lives have been lost in the contest. Under these circumstances, there can be no such thing as ascertaining clearly, and without doubt, the will of the people in any way, except by their own direct expression of it at the polls. A constitution not subjected to that test, no matter what it contains, will never be acknowledged by its opponents to be anything but a fraud. A plausible color might be given to this assertion by the argument that members of the convention could have no motive for refusing to submit their work to their constituents, except a consciousness that the majority would condemn it. We confess that we should find some difficulty in answering this. What other motive could they have?

"We do most devoutly believe, that unless the constitution of Kansas be submitted to the direct vote of the people, the unhappy controversy which has heretofore raged in that Territory, will be prolonged for an indefinite time to come. We are equally well convinced that the will of the majority, whether it be for or against slavery, will finally triumph, though it may be after years of strife, disastrous to the best interests of the country, and dangerous, it may be, to the peace and safety of the whole Union.

"Again: This movement of the territorial authorities to form a constitution is made, not in the regular way, in pursuance of an enabling and authorizing act of Congress, but in the mere motion of the Territorial Legislature itself. Nay, it has been begun and carried on in the teeth of a refusal by Congress to pass such an act. This irregularity is not fatal. There are other cases in which it was overlooked. But it can be waived only in consideration of the fact that the people have expressed their will in unmistakable language. If we dispense with the legal forms of proceedings, we must have the substance.

"We think, for these reasons, that Governor Walker, in advocating a submission of the constitution to a vote of the people, acted with wisdom and justice, and followed the only line of policy which promises to settle this vexed question either rightly or satisfactorily. In this respect, at least, he has done nothing worthy of death or bonds.

"But who are the people? What shall be the qualifications of a voter on the constitution, when it comes to be submitted? We answer that this is for the convention to settle. Those who think that the convention might declare the constitution in full force by virtue of their own will, can hardly deny that they might appeal to it a condition requiring it to be first approved by the people. If they can do this, they can also say what classes of persons shall be counted as being a part of the people. The convention that formed the Federal Constitution exercised this power when they referred it to their constituents [the States] and prescribed that their approbation should be given or withheld by State conventions. The constitution of Virginia was submitted to the votes of men enfranchised by the convention for the first time. Of course, the Kansas convention will see that every proper guard is thrown around the legal voter, and that his bona fide intention to remain in the Territory is tested by a previous residence of sufficient length. We should say that the qualifications required to make a legal voter under the constitution ought to entitle an inhabitant to vote upon it—for or against its adoption."

I propose, next, Mr. President, to consider a suggestion which was made by the Senator from Missouri, that, as a legal proposition, fraud is not to be presumed—it must always be proved. As a legal proposition, that is true; but it is equally certain that fraud, like every other fact, is to be proved by any legitimate evidence that bears upon the question. I propose, now, to examine the character and the conduct of the convention. I have already said something as to the mode in which it was elected and organized. I propose, now, to take up its own conduct as found, first, in the constitution it has prepared; and second, in the declarations of its members. I intend to show, what I am thoroughly convinced of myself, that the convention intended a trick and a fraud upon the people of Kansas. First let me speak of the mode of submission.

While the constitution framed at Lecompton declares, on its face, that it shall be submitted to the people on a particular day for adoption or rejection it provides that it shall be submitted in a manner which puts it out of the power of the people to reject it. Every man who votes upon that constitution at all must vote for it. Not a vote at the election in regard to the constitution can be given against it.

More, sir; the constitution framed at Lecompton lays down the qualification of voters at the election which was to have been held on Monday last. It provides that every free white male inhabitant, of the age of twenty-one years, on the day of the election, shall have the right to vote; but suppose a man is challenged, what then? Is it provided that he shall swear that he is an inhabitant of the Territory, on that day, and that he is a free white male citizen, twenty-one years old? No, sir; not a word is to be asked him on that point; not a single question is to be addressed to him to ascertain whether he possesses the qualifications of a voter which the constitution has laid down, but he is to "take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and to support this constitution, if adopted, under the penalties of perjury under the territorial laws." Is any man prepared to say that this provision is not inserted to deter every one from voting who will not swear to support the Lecompton constitution? It is presented to the voter as a whole; and although, after inspection of it, he may say that it contains provisions exceedingly repugnant to his judgment; yet, for the purpose of voting upon the question that is submitted, whether slavery shall hereafter be introduced into Kansas or not, he makes up his mind to shut his eyes to those provisions that are obnoxious, and avail himself of the privilege of voting, but he is stopped at the door of the place where he is to deposit his vote and challenged. Then he has to swear that he will support every provision of that constitution if it shall be adopted; and it cannot fail to be adopted. It must be adopted, if no more than fifteen votes shall have been given for it, because no man can vote against it; and every man who takes the oath and votes is subjected to the pains and penalties of perjury, if, at any time afterwards, he shall exercise the privilege of a freeman by seeking to overthrow it. For what purpose was this provision inserted if it was not to deter any white male inhabitant in Kansas, of the age of twenty-one years, from voting for or against the introduction of slavery unless he swears to support every provision of the instrument?

I object to the manner of submission. The schedule provides that the constitution shall be submitted to all the people of the Territory on the day of election, for acceptance or rejection, and that they shall vote, "constitution with slavery," or "constitution with no slavery;" and if the votes headed "constitution with no slavery" prevail, "slavery shall no longer exist in the State of Kansas, except that the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with." What is the right of property in the slaves now there? It is the right to their service and the service of their increase as time goes forward. They may multiply by tens, by hundreds, and by thousands, and this constitution provides that the right to them shall in no manner be affected. Is that in accordance with the provision of the constitution that slavery shall not thereafter exist in Kansas? Is that a fair submission of the question of slavery or no slavery to the people of Kansas?

If the convention, in submitting that question, had said, "If the ballots 'constitution with slavery' shall be found to be in the majority, slavery shall exist in Kansas, except that all children hereafter born shall be free, and every person in Kansas shall be free after the 4th day of July, 1864," would any pro-slavery man in Kansas, would any one, say that was a fair submission of the question of slavery? Would it, in the language of the Nebraska bill, "leave the people perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way?" Yet, would not that be equivalent to the present form of submission, simply changing sides? Is it the number of slaves in a State that determines its character as a slave State, or is it the tenure by which they are held?

To show that the same opinion which I entertain as to the result of the submission of the slavery clause, in the mode in which it is submitted, is entertained in other quarters, I will read an extract from a letter published in the Jackson Mississippian of November 27, written from Lecompton on the 7th of November:

"And then they united upon the plan of submission presented in the majority report of the committee on the schedule, and, after some immaterial amendments, 'put it through.' It is this: the constitution shall be submitted to all the white male inhabitants of the Territory over the age of twenty-one years on the 21st of December next, for ratification or rejection, in the following manner: the voting shall be by ballot, and the ballots cast at said election shall be indorsed 'constitution with slavery,' or 'constitution without slavery;' and if it shall appear upon examination of the returns by the president of the convention, to whom they are to be made, that a majority of the votes cast be in favor of the constitution with slavery, he shall have the constitution, so ratified, transmitted to Congress. But if a majority shall be in favor of the constitution without slavery, then the article in the constitution providing for slavery shall, by the president of the convention, be stricken out, and slavery shall no longer exist in the State of Kansas, (except that the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with.) And the constitution, so ratified, shall be sent to Congress. Provision is also made requiring that any one proposing to vote at said election shall, on being challenged, take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and this constitution, if ratified.

"Thus you see that whilst, by submitting the question in this form, they are bound to have a ratification of the one or the other, and that while it seems to be an election between a free-State and pro-slavery constitution, it is in fact but a question of the future introduction of slavery that is in controversy; and yet it furnishes our friends in Congress a basis on which to rest their vindication of the admission of Kansas as a State under it into the Union; while they would not have it, sent directly from the convention.

"It is the very best proposition for making Kansas a slave State that was submitted for the consideration of the convention. In addition to what I have stated, it embraces a provision continuing in force all existing laws of the Territory until repealed by the Legislature of the State to be elected under the provisions of this constitution."

The Lecompton National Democrat, of November 19th, published on the spot, says:

"THE CONSTITUTION.—We publish this instrument today in full. It occupies almost the whole of our available space, and precludes the possibility of any extended remarks.

"Our opinion of the final action of the convention, as briefly given in our last issue, has not been changed by such an examination of the constitution as we have been able to give it. We still think that the whole subject should have been submitted to the people. But, at all events, the slavery question should have been fully and fairly put to the people for their decision. This, as we understand it, has not been done. No matter how the people may vote, if this constitution should prevail, Kansas will be a slave State. We would not object to this result if the people should so will it; but we think they should have a full opportunity to determine the character of the institutions of the new State."

A recent number of the Charleston Mercury substantiates this view in these words:

"We lay before our readers this morning the message of the President of the United States. It is, as was to be expected, an able document, sound in almost all of its positions, and worthy of the Chief Magistrate of our great confederated Republic. The main point of difficulty and delicacy is in the affairs of Kansas. He thinks that the convention of Kansas, in submitting only the clause in the constitution relating to slavery, has fulfilled what he supposes to be the requisition of the Kansas Nebraska act. We are equally satisfied with the action of the convention. We differ, too, with the President as to what is submitted to the vote of the people. We do not think that the question of slavery or no slavery is submitted to the vote of the people. Whether the clause in the constitution is voted out or voted in, slavery exists and has a guarantee in the constitution that it shall not be interfered with; whilst, if the slavery party in Kansas can keep or get the majority of the Legislature, they may open wide the door for the immigration of slaves. But this, also, is a small matter of difference with the President. It is enough for us that he goes with the South in the policy of admitting Kansas into the Union, with the constitution she shall present, whether with or without the slavery clause. We heartily support his policy, although we may not agree in all his reasoning. And, above all, we rejoice for the sake of our old partiality, and our advocacy of him before he reached the illustrious dignity of the Presidency, that he has not soiled his fame by identifying it with Walker."

My view of the effect of the submission of the slavery clause in the mode in which it is submitted, is strengthened by the proclamation of the president of the convention, in which he proclaims:

"Now, therefore, be it known to the people of Kansas Territory, that on the said 21st day of December, 1857, polls will be opened in the several election districts of said Territory, at which the actual bona fide white male inhabitants, resident in said Territory, on said day aforesaid, shall vote for or against the future introduction of slavery into said State of Kansas, in the manner following, as required by said constitution:

"The voting shall be by ballot, and those voting for Kansas as a slave State shall vote a ballot with the words, 'Constitution with slavery,' and those voting for Kansas to be a free State shall vote a ballot with the words, 'Constitution with no slavery.'"

In the bill of rights, this Lecompton constitution declares that all elections shall be free and equal; and yet, as I have shown, by the schedule which follows it, a test oath is put into the constitution expressly to prevent the voting of any man who is not willing to support all its provisions. Further, the bill of rights declares that it is an inalienable and indefeasible right of the people to amend or alter the constitution whenever they please; but the schedule which follows says, that whenever the constitution may be amended, they shall not be permitted to make any amendment affecting the right of property in slaves. Thus while this convention lay down certain fundamental principles in the bill of rights, in the schedule they themselves violate every one of them. Honorable Senators who have argued the question on the other side have cited the provision that it is an inalienable and indefeasible right of the people to alter or amend the constitution at any time; yet the schedule provides that no amendment which may be made shall affect the right of property in slaves.

Sir, it may be necessary for me to say—if it is, I beg the attention of the Senate while I say it—that I am not discussing this question with reference to my own opinions upon slavery; I am not discussing it with regard to my own opinions on any provision contained in the constitution; but I am discussing it for the purpose of proving that the action of the convention is, and was intended to be, a trick and a fraud upon the people of Kansas.

What else have they done in the submission of this question to the people of Kansas? They have done what, so far as my research goes, never was done, or attempted to be done, by any other Territory in the history of this Government. They have ignored the territorial condition, the territorial laws, the territorial organization. Every other State formed from a Territory whose history I have been able to examine, has provided that the president of the convention should issue his proclamation to the sheriffs or other proper officers of the Territory to hold an election on a certain day, the people at that election voting upon the constitution. What has this convention done? It has provided that the president of the convention shall appoint commissioners in each county; that those commissioners shall appoint the inspectors of election; that they shall establish the precincts, hold the election, and make the returns eventually to him. If he is absent or dead, or for any other reason does not choose to attend to it, the president pro tempore of the convention is clothed with the authority; and if he is out of the way, seven men of the convention do it.

I was not at all surprised when the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Indiana stopped at this point, and said they should be glad to see what was done under such provisions, in regard to an election, before committing themselves to vote for the admission of Kansas under this constitution. What do you expect they will do? What does their history show you they have already done? They have set the will of the people at defiance. They have told you in their published debates that the very reason why they will not submit this constitution to a vote of the people is that the people will vote it down if they have a chance. The Washington Union, in the article to which I have referred, asks what earthly reason there is for withholding the constitution from a vote of the people, "except a consciousness that the majority would condemn it?" and the editor adds, "we confess that we should find some difficulty in answering that." Sir, these men have not left you to inference; they have proclaimed, in their own debates, that they will not allow the factious people of Kansas to vote down their work. One must admire them for their courage, if he cannot for their honesty. Theirs is a bold position. It is this: here we are, forty or fifty men assembled in convention, in the Territory of Kansas, about to perform the great act of bringing a new sovereignty into existence, about to fix the fundamental law to govern the people; and we know that we have so fixed it that, if it be submitted to their vote, they will reject it by an immense majority; therefore, they shall not have the opportunity. It is bold, but it is not ingenious. It is what any desperado can do; but it is not honest, it is not just.

What, then, I ask, are you to expect from a convention whose conduct is thus marked with dishonesty, with fraud, with trickery, from the time they commenced their work down to its close? Why wait to see the result of the election of the 21st of December, when you have the best evidence in the world, the light of the past conduct of these men, to enable you to say what they will do? They will do whatever they shall deem necessary to effect and perfect their act of oppression upon the people of Kansas.

I have already referred to the peculiar provisions under which the election of the 21st was to be held. I will now, in addition, mention the fact that I have examined the laws of Kansas, and find there is no law to prevent fraudulent returns at that election. This view is taken by acting Governor Stanton, in his recent message to the Territorial Legislature:

"The laws now prevailing in this Territory provide for the proper punishment of illegal and fraudulent voting, but there is no provision which will reach the case of fraudulent returns. The case of the late Oxford precinct, in Johnson county, was an enormity so great that it has nowhere been defended or justified. Yet the evil consequences of it are seen in the fact that even the late convention has been so far imposed upon that, in its apportionment for the State Legislature under the constitution, it has assigned to Johnson county four representatives, which must necessarily be based on the notoriously false returns from that county. In order to meet the apprehensions naturally growing out of these circumstances, I recommend the adoption of a provision making it felony, with suitable punishment, for any judge or clerk of election knowingly to place on the poll-books the names of persons not actually present and voting, or otherwise corruptly to make false returns, either of the election held by order of the convention, or of any other election to be held in this Territory."

Let me ask any Senator here this question: If there were an election in his own State upon a matter of great political importance, when the people were excited, and the subject itself one of vital character, would he consent to go into an election when the prime man of his opponents was to appoint the inspectors, receive the returns, and count the votes? Would you, sir, submit your liberties to any such election as that? I speak not of a State where law, order, and honesty of purpose have characterized its history. But, in Kansas, where fraud and violence, rapine and murder, have characterized the extreme men of both parties, would you submit to an election held in that way? Is there a Senator here from the South who would say, "I am willing, to-day, that General Lane, if he be alive, shall appoint the commissioners, and these commissioners appoint the inspectors to hold the election; that they shall make the returns to Lane, and that he shall count the votes, and declare the result of the election?" If there is a southern Senator here who would do it, I would not; nor would I trust any extreme man upon the other side; nor would I trust anybody but the constituted authorities of Kansas. Why pass over the legislative authorities; why ignore the inspectors, who hold their office by virtue of territorial law; unless it be for the purpose of deceiving and defrauding the people? "Wait," says the Senator from Indiana; "wait," says the Senator from Pennsylvania. "I will not commit myself," says each of them. "Here," says the Senator from Pennsylvania, "are large and dangerous powers given to, the president of the convention; I want to see what he will do, before I determine what I will do." Well, now, sir, for my part, I do not wish to wait for that purpose. When I see a man who, during his canvass for the position of delegate to the convention, published over his own signature the resolutions of the convention that nominated him, declaring that they would support no man for delegate who did not pledge himself to submit the constitution to a free and fair vote of the people for ratification or rejection, after the election disavow, ignore, and trample under foot that avowal which was to get the people's votes, I do not wish to wait any longer to know what he will do. That there may be no mistake as to the pledge of the president of the convention to submit the constitution to the popular vote, I submit his pledge, signed by himself, and other candidates:

To the Democratic voters of Douglas county:

It having been stated by that abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats who have got up an independent ticket for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we, the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolution, which was adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily indorse, as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

JOHN CALHOUN,	A. W. JONES,
W. S. WELLS,	H. BUTCHER,
L. S. BOLING,	JOHN M. WALLACE,
W. T. SPIGELY,	L. A. PRATHER.

LECOMPTON, KANSAS TERRITORY, June 13, 1857.

"Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duties it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas, and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself, fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas, at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers of this Territory, as the majority of voters shall decide."

A man who, after such a pledge before the election, turns round and tramples it under foot, will do anything that God has given him the power to do to defraud the people; or if he should happen to be intimidated, he can turn it over to the president pro tempore; and if he should not happen to be bold enough to carry it out, he can find seven men of the convention who will; for all history proves that seven men will do, together, what no one of them would dare do alone. I may mention here that the convention which nominated Governor Ransom for Congress voted down, by a majority of forty to one, a proposition to accept the constitution whether it should be submitted to the people or not, thus showing the clear understanding of the Democratic party of Kansas that the constitution should be submitted to the people.

Mr. President, if the action of this convention was to be limited to the people of Kansas, there might, by possibility, be some other view of it presented, that might affect my course, but when I am asked to give my vote to consummate this fraud, I answer—never. It will be seen that I have not attached that importance to preliminary action which some men have. I have said that the Kansas-Nebraska act embodies the great principle that lies at the foundation of our Government. It cannot be better expressed than it has been by the President himself, in his letter accepting the Cincinnati nomination:

"The recent legislation of Congress respecting domestic slavery, derived as it has been from the original and pure fountain of legitimate political power, the will of the majority, promises ere long to allay the dangerous excitement. The legislation is founded upon principles as ancient as free government itself."

Upon every occasion on which I have addressed the people of my own State and others, I have pledged myself to abide faithfully and unqualifiedly by the provisions of that act. I have pledged myself everywhere to stand by this principle "as ancient as free government itself," and to assure to the people of every State and Territory—and Kansas in particular—the full, free, and unqualified right to exercise their opinions in regard to the institutions they will have. The Democratic party has planted itself, in terms as plain as human language is capable of specifying it, on the same platform, in the convention which nominated Mr. Buchanan. Not a Senator has spoken here but has expressed his regret, his deep regret, and the President himself has expressed his, in the strongest terms, that this constitution was not submitted to the people of Kansas by the direction of that convention. The policy adopted by the President, and carried out in Kansas, was wisely founded on this principle of free government; and had the convention adopted it, all would now be peaceful and quiet there. The resolution passed at Cincinnati, to which I have alluded, is in these words:

"Resolved, That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and, whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

These principles, I have said, are embodied in the Kansas act; and they must be carried out by Congress, if it is intended to maintain this Government. They must be carried out, if it is intended to maintain a national Democratic organization in the country; but more, I say they must be carried out, if it is intended to maintain the union of these States. Why, sir, look at it; look at the present condition of things in Kansas—the people there protesting against the action of the convention, and asking the Governor to convene, as he has convened, an extraordinary session of the Legislature to meet the contingency. They are arming; they are determined to resist an admission under this constitution, by any and every power with which God has clothed them; and yet we are to sit here, and say, "we admit you into the Union of the United States." As well might you take a prisoner, under the sentence of a court of justice, handcuffed, with your officers surrounding him, by force to the prison, and say to him, "there is no coercion, we admit you into the penitentiary." [Laughter.]

I repeat, sir, the people stand there in open arms, and the telegraphic wires have but this day brought us the information that insurrections are springing up throughout that Territory against this attempt to coerce them into the Union, and cram this constitution down their throats. To call that an admission of a State is to falsify the use of language—and for what? There is the substance of this inquiry when you have done—for what? Is there any impending necessity for admitting Kansas under the present constitution? Is there anything in the public condition of the country that makes it an imperious necessity that Kansas shall be admitted now, under this constitution? Will it not do in April? Will it not do in May? Will it not do next year? Was there not an election in Kansas in October last, under the judicious, prudent, cautious, and well-timed policy of the President of the United States, which was peaceful, at which the people voted and had a right to vote? Was it not quiet then? Did not order reign there, and would it not reign there now but for the operations of this convention? Why this haste to admit Kansas under this Lecompton fraud? Why not wait? Why may not Congress wait? What is to be gained? Why, say some gentlemen, we want to localize this dispute; we want to fence it in within the bounds of Kansas; we have had enough of it in Congress, and more than enough of it throughout the Union. Well, sir, if there be one man in all these United States, who more than another feels that desire, I would claim to be that man.

From the commencement of my public life down to to-day, it has seemed to me as if there never was anything before my vision but a woolly-headed negro. [Laughter.] You can scarcely meet a gentleman here in private conversation, you cannot meet him in debate, but that on one side or the other this eternal and interminable question of slavery is ever before your eyes.

But, sir, will this sort of measure localize it? The great Patrick Henry said that he knew of no light by which to guide his footsteps, except the lamp of experience. What is our experience on this matter? From the time the Kansas-Nebraska act was passed, have not the northern and southern States been engaged in a strife in regard to the settlement of Kansas and the establishment or rejection of slavery therein? Not only have law and order been violated, but, as I have said before, lives have been taken, and rapine and murder have grown out of it; and the President tells us that when he came into power, the condition of things in that Territory was alarming; civil war was impending. You find the Territory alive now, and bad men exercising their power. Hand to hand they are about to take each other's blood.

Do you suppose that by simply changing this from a territorial to a State government you are going to produce quiet and peace throughout the other States of this Union, and localize the difficulty in Kansas? Why, sir, as well might you believe that, having fired the foundation of your building, the flame would never reach its roof. A people there resisting a monstrous fraud by hundreds and by thousands, and Congress consummate the fraud and expect that people to submit! We have no right to expect it. But what of these Lecompton gentlemen—these gentlemen who have not only taken care to provide an election which shall fix a constitution to suit them, but have taken care to provide an election which shall elect a Legislature and Governor and State officers also to suit them? Will they not hold the power, and, holding it, will they not exercise it as they have exercised it? When these people undertake to rise and exercise the inalienable and indefeasible right which this constitution says they have got, will not these constituted authorities say to them as the constituted authorities of Rhode Island did, "you are in insurrection; you are undertaking to overthrow the constitution; I, as Governor of the State, call out the military to put you down; and if your movement becomes too formidable, I will call upon the President of the United States to aid me?" The law provides that when the Legislature, or, in the absence of their being in session, the Governor, calls upon the President, he must respond. What says the Supreme Court upon principles like these? In the case of Luther, the Supreme Court says it will recognize, in executing the laws of the country, the government that the Executive authority of the United States has recognized. The laws of the United States prescribe the duty of the President. It is to respond to the Governor and Legislature of Kansas. They, I say, are taken care of, and secured by this same convention. These are the men who will be in power, and you expect to localize the difficulty.

I have said that one of the most unfortunate results of these political discussions is the engendering of erroneous opinions, many of them fraught with danger to this Confederacy; and not among the least of these is that idea got up in certain States that when any of your citizens go to another State or Territory you have some right or authority to take care of them after they are there. We are not without history on that point. It has been done in the States of this Union. They have passed legislative acts and authorized men and means, and weapons in some instances, to be carried to Kansas to take care of somebody's liberties who before was a citizen of that State. Do you suppose that civil war can exist in Kansas, and that that people will not be sympathized with by the people of the other States? Have you any power to control them? Can Missouri or Iowa keep its citizens within its own borders when their brothers and fathers and other relatives are fighting a hand-to-hand fight in Kansas? It is impossible. Can any State do it? It is not to be expected; and it was for that reason, prominent among all others, that compelled me to say, as I did on the reading of the message, that, if I could agree with the reasoning of the President, I might possibly agree with his conclusions. Sir, I believe that just so sure as you undertake to consummate this Lecompton fraud, and force this constitution upon the people of Kansas against their will, as firmly I believe it as I believe I am a living man to-day, you will light the torch of civil discord throughout this Union. Gentlemen may then cry "peace! peace!" but there will be no peace.

Sir, if you desire peace, it is easily attained; attained without the expense of violating any principle; attained simply by the plainest process in the world—by adopting that principle which lies at the foundation of our institutions, and, in the language of the President, "is as ancient as free government itself," the principle of the Kansas organic law. Take such means and such measures as will secure to the people of Kansas the right to settle this question by a majority of their votes, and all will be peace. Is it not easy? Cannot the people of Kansas wait? Cannot Congress wait?

I have said that the power of admitting States into this Union necessarily forces upon Congress the paramount duty of seeing that the State asks its admission in accordance with the will of a majority of the people. Show me that, and I will never inquire one instant as to what their domestic institutions are or what other provision is contained in their constitution, so that it secures a republican government, which is no more nor less than a representative government, based upon the will of the people. As I said, I am pledged to that by every speech I have ever made in my State. I am pledged to that upon the principles of the strictest honor and justice among men. Higher, higher yet, I am pledged to it by my oath to support the Constitution of the United States, which empowers me by my vote to admit States into the Union—never to coerce them in.

You will see, therefore, Mr. President, that whatever consequences may result from entertaining these views, I could not if I would, and I am bound to say I would not if I could, give my vote to consummate what I believe to be the most enormous fraud that was ever undertaken to be practiced upon any people under the forms of law. And I submit that the only oppressions under our institutions that can be practiced upon a people, must be practiced under the forms of law. If you undertake, in violation of law, to strip the people of their liberties, they can resist you. Then the law of power prevails, and if they be the strongest they can put you down. But when you undertake oppression, within the forms of law, you can grind them to the dust, and they can never resist without being rebels according to law.

If you desire peace, as I know we all do, take the path of wisdom and justice; regard the Constitution of the United States like a great indestructible rock, taking nothing by accretion, losing nothing by disintegration; within the bounds of its provisions act upon and abide by the will of the majority, fully, freely, and fairly expressed. Although you may see in communities, as you have seen at every heated partisan election, the people excited to the highest pitch of human animosity, even blood shed like rivers in the streets, yet, when the will of the majority is announced, all is peace. Pursue the paths of wisdom, of justice, and you will find the ways are all "ways of pleasantness, and all the paths are peace." I submit to the consideration of Senators that it is a duty we owe to the people of every Territory to see that they are protected in the enjoyment of this right. As Mr. Buchanan in his inaugural address says:

"It is the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. This sacred right of each individual must be preserved."

There never was a greater truth uttered; there never was one more fundamental in our institutions; there never was one that could be violated with more danger, and none which could be followed with more security.

Mr. President, there is only one point further that I wish to notice, and I would not do that if it were not for the enormity of one proposition presented by this convention. I refer to it as showing their intention. I am not going to discuss, in opposition to the honorable Senator from Missouri, the effect of the ordinance contained in the constitution. I shall not discuss whether, if we admit them under this constitution, we accept their terms and give them all the lands in Kansas or not. It is not material to decide that. They assert that they have an unquestioned right to tax all your lands in Kansas, as soon as they become a State? Are you prepared to admit it? Is the Congress of the United States at this day prepared to admit that, when we organize a new State out of a Territory, that State has a right to tax and legislate over the lands of the United States within its borders equally with the lands of individual citizens? If so, you must make a contract with them, in order to get them to release that right. Inasmuch as it takes two to make a bargain, you must get their agreement to the contract, or they will retain and exercise the right. What sort of demand have they made to begin with? They demand one ninth of all the land in Kansas, for school purposes; they demand seventy-two sections for a university; they demand all the salt springs, and all the mineral lands, and all the lands adjoining, necessary to use them; and also alternate sections for twenty-four miles wide through Kansas, east and west, and north and south. This is their demand for relinquishing the right to tax the Government land within the borders of Kansas. Before

I make this bargain, I desire time for consideration. Before I vote to give Kansas four times as much school land as Michigan has had, I shall want to know the reason. Before I give them twice as much land in width, for railroad purposes, as I have voted to any other State, I shall want to know why. Before I shall vote to give them all the mineral lands, and all the salt spring lands, and all the adjoining lands necessary to their use, I shall want to ascertain the boundaries, and see whether anything will be left to the United States. I have had prepared a table showing the number of acres which an agreement to the terms of the convention will require us to give.

I have not mentioned this matter to discuss the effect of admitting Kansas under this constitution, but to show the enormity of the proposition—the intention that seems to have been in the heads of these Lecompton conventionists. My opinion is that they have undertaken a larger work than they can accomplish. In the first place, they not only undertake to violate the rights of the people of Kansas, and put them under their feet; but, in the next place, they undertake to coerce Congress into a bargain that is monstrous in its character. If it is the duty, as I have endeavored to show, of Congress to protect the people of Kansas in the enjoyment of their rights, it is no less the duty of Congress to protect the rights of the United States. Congress will be liberal, as it always has been liberal with the new States, in grants of land for educational and internal improvement purposes; but it will not admit, it never can admit, that lands which belong to the United States, which it has been so often said were acquired by the common blood and common treasure of all the States, are transferred, with the right and title, to a new State, on its being admitted into the Union.

Mr. President, I have thus, briefly as I could, though not so connectedly as I could wish, presented the reasons which are operating on my mind against the admission of Kansas upon the Lecompton constitution. I have sought to show, and I hope I have shown, that it cannot thus be admitted without violating the rights of the people of Kansas, without conceding rights that belong to the Congress and people of the United States, without violating the Constitution of the United States itself. I agree that the power to admit new States, like any other power under the Constitution, is liable to abuse; but like every other power under the Constitution and within the Constitution, it must be exercised according to the best discretion of Congress. I agree that a refusal to admit a State upon insufficient grounds would be a palpable violation of our duty. We have the power to do it, but that would be an abuse of the power; just as having the power to raise and support armies, if we were to raise and support an army of twenty thousand when only one thousand was necessary, it would be an abuse of the authority. That we have the power to admit or to refuse to admit a State according to our sound discretion, cannot be denied. Having that power, if there be a doubt as to whether you are proposing to admit a State into the Union or to coerce it into the Union, nothing can be lost by taking time to ask the people in a plain, safe, unmistakable manner whether they desired it or not. The people of a Territory which is about to be formed into a State, have a right—and so far as my examination has gone, Congress has never violated this right—to say, in the first place, whether they desire to form a State constitution now, or not. They have a right to say whether they will take upon themselves the burdens and expenses of a State government. Where Congress has passed enabling acts, as in the cases of Ohio, Indiana, and other States, and in the celebrated Toombs bill, which has been so much talked of, an express provision was incorporated, that when the convention was assembled, it should vote, in the first instance, whether it is expedient and proper to proceed to form a State constitution at this time. The people of Kansas have never had a chance to say this, although they might say “we are willing to live under this Lecompton constitution when we get ready to be a State; we are not ready to become a State now.” That is a right, a sacred and inviolable right, which belongs to the people of a Territory when they are invited to become a State.

There are other considerations which occur to me, but it is not necessary that I should detain the Senate now by stating them. I have shown, or sought to show, conclusive reasons, founded upon constitutional authority and political propriety, why I cannot vote for this Lecompton movement. I leave cheerfully, freely, and fully, every one of my associates on this floor, and in Congress, to exercise his judgment on the same state of facts. It is a right they have; it is a right I have; more, it is a duty—a paramount duty; it is the highest exercise of our power, perhaps, that is conferred on us by the Constitution of the United States; and no principle should be allowed to govern us in regard to it, except the principle of eternal truth and justice.

I conclude with the statement which I made when the President's message was read; that, so far as in me lies, the people of Kansas, like the people of every other State coming into this Union, shall, in the language of the Kansas act, be left “perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way.” I will hear them; I will do as Congress has done heretofore—I will pass over forms, ceremonies, organizations, down deep to the will of the people; but, in the history of this country, there never yet has been a time, and I cannot believe there ever will be a time, when Congress will admit a State on forms and ceremonies contrary to the will of the people. The example of Mr. Buchanan, in regard to my own State, has been cited, and properly cited, in this debate. He passed over forms and ceremonies to get at the will of the people. He contended that the organization was irregular; but the people ask for admission, and the people were to be admitted upon their demand. Conform your action, in such cases, to the will of the people, and you will always be right.

Thanking the Senate for the attention they have paid to me—and I find it necessary to apologize for the incomplete manner in which my views have been presented—I leave the subject, contented to perform my duty when this constitution shall be presented here, according to the principles which I have laid down to-day. In the language of the honorable Senator from Illinois, I intend to follow the principles of the Kansas act, and all its logical and legal consequences, take me where they may; for I believe, with the President, that that act has simply put into shape and legislative enactment a principle as ancient as free government itself, and without whose exercise there can be no free government.

Mr. BRODERICK. As I am the only Senator, I believe, on this side of the House who feels disposed, with the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Michigan, to oppose the Lecompton constitution, I should like, before the adjournment of the Senate to-day, to be heard for a very few minutes on this question.

I have listened to the debate very attentively; and while I agree with the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Michigan in most of what they have said, I disagree with them in regard to the President's connection with the question. When the President of the United States sent Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton to Kansas, they found the people there in a state of insurrection, and, after a great deal of labor on the part of those gentlemen, they restored peace and quiet to Kansas. I think the President of the United States and his Cabinet are alone responsible for the present outbreak in Kansas. Governor Walker had returned to Washington before the President of the United States issued his message. He conversed with the President of the United States on the subject of Kansas. I understand that he told him that fifteen out of the thirty-four counties in Kansas were deprived of a voice in the election of delegates to the Lecompton convention. If I understand this subject, and I hope I do, I think that the President of the United States is alone responsible for the present state of affairs in Kansas. It is the first time, I believe, in the history of this country, that a President of the United States ever stepped down from the exalted position he held, to attempt to coerce the people into a base submission to the will of an illegal body of men.

I have heard a great deal said about the question of slavery being submitted to the people of Kansas. Why, sir, I consider that the question of slavery was submitted to the people of Kansas at the October election in a more favorable aspect than it will ever be presented to them again. Mr. Ransom was nominated by the Democratic party for Congress, and if I had been a citizen of Kansas I should have voted for him. The pro-slavery men of Kansas had the advantage of presenting a man from a free State for Congress; for I understand from very good authority, that Mr. Ransom is not a pro-slavery man. What was the result of that election? We find that Mr. Parrott, the Republican candidate for Congress, was returned by a majority of some three thousand. I consider that since the people of Kansas had a chance to deliberate on the question of slavery, and to express their views on it at the election in October last, the question of slavery was settled. I have been informed by two pro-slavery gentlemen from Kansas that the slavery question was not discussed at all about the time this convention was called to make a constitution. They considered that it had been disposed of at the October election, and for that reason that it would never be agitated in the Territory again.

I am very sorry that I am placed in the unfortunate position of disagreeing with my party on this question, for I believe that I rendered as much service in my way in the election of Mr. Buchanan as any gentleman on this floor. He was my choice before the convention at Cincinnati met. I considered him the most available and the most conservative candidate that could be presented to the American people for election to the Presidency, and for that reason I supported him. I regret very much that I am compelled to differ with him on this question; but, sir, I intend to hold him responsible for it. I do not intend, because I am a member of the Democratic party, to permit the President of the United States, who has been elected by that party, to create civil war in Kansas. The only thing that has astonished me in this whole matter is the forbearance of the people of Kansas. If they had taken the delegates to the Lecompton convention and flogged them, or cut their ears off, and driven them out of the country, I would have applauded them for the act.

I have spoken for the purpose of placing myself right upon this question. It would be idle in me to attempt to discuss it after it has been so ably discussed by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Michigan; but as the Senate is about to adjourn to-day until after the holidays, I thought it would be well for me to place myself right on the record at least, and I have spoken for that purpose. I may have something to say upon this Lecompton constitution if it shall ever be presented to the Senate for their action.

Yesterday I listened to the remark made by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. FISCUS], that we all knew how party platforms were made. I have been in the habit of submitting to the rule of my party. I am not like a great many other gentlemen on this floor, even tainted with Free-Soilism or Republicanism. I divided the great Democratic party in New York in 1847 on this question. There are two gentlemen now holding seats on this floor—the Senator from New York [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE]—who were members of a convention held in that State at that time. They will both bear witness that in that convention they made the proposition to the party to which I was attached, that if we would consent to the passage of a series of resolutions indorsing the Wilmot proviso, our wing of the party should have all the State offices. [Laughter.] It was indignantly spurned, and the party were defeated by a very large majority. I cannot, therefore, even be suspected of being in any way connected with Free-Soilism. I would say further, that my most bitter and malignant opponents in the State which I have now the honor in part to represent, belong to the Republican party. I have thus stated my views for the purpose of setting myself right on the record. I feel embarrassed—very much embarrassed in doing so, because this is the first time I have ever attempted to address the Senate of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to make a single remark in answer to what fell from the Senator from California.

Mr. BAYARD. I withdraw the motion for the present, if the Senator will renew it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir; I will renew the motion. Mr. President, it is true, as stated by the Senator from California, that he, and the Senator from New York, [Mr. KING], and myself, were members of the convention in the State of New York when what was termed the Democratic party of that day was divided on this very issue. It is true that at that time in the history of the affairs of this country, a resolution was introduced into the Democratic convention of the State of New York, declaring the uncompromising hostility of the Democracy of New York to the extension of slavery into any Territory now free, by any action of the General Government. It is true that the honorable Senator from California, then being a delegate to the convention from the city of New York, and myself a delegate to the convention from the western portion of that State, disagreed in relation to the introduction of that resolution; but I hope the honorable Senator will bear witness, that as far as I am concerned, at least, no proposition ever came from me, directly or indirectly, that in consideration of that resolution being passed in the convention, offices should be bestowed on the other side.

Mr. BRODERICK. The Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to explain. I may have spoken too hastily on this question. I had not much conversation at that time with the Senator from Wisconsin; the conversation took place between the Senator from New York and myself. It is true that he did not make the proposition, and if he had made it it would not have been accepted; but he called upon me for the purpose of getting the Democratic party in New York to present an unbroken front to the Whig party. We should have been in a large majority in the election if we had been united. I am sure the Democratic party would have succeeded by some forty or fifty thousand votes. I did not wish to be understood as saying that the Senator made it a condition precedent that I should go for their resolution. On the contrary, I meant quite the reverse.

Mr. KING. I have no reason or disposition to doubt the accuracy of the recollection of the Senator from California, though I have myself no special recollection of a conversation on that subject. But I will say, frankly, that I have always considered that there could be no other motive on the part of a citizen residing in the free States to favor the extension of slavery than the hope of obtaining office from a majority made up by votes from the southern people. That was my opinion then, and it is my opinion now. [Laughter.] Those with whom I have acted have never been, in my judgment, so anxious for office as to be controlled by that consideration. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRODERICK. I did not hear the first remark made by the Senator from New York, but I would call to his recollection a circumstance connected with it; and I think I shall be able to jog his memory. The gentleman may recollect that, when the vote on the resolution was taken, it was about half past two or three o'clock on a Sunday morning. [Laughter.] He was in a state of great excitement. He had the resolution in his hand, and he had it in his hand, I believe, for an hour or two before, in readiness to present it to the convention for their action. He told me that his friends were not anxious to get any of the offices; that it was a matter of principle entirely with him and his friends; and that, if the portion of the party I represented were anxious to secure the offices, as a matter of course, if we would only pass his resolution they would make no opposition to the wing of the party I represented making their nominations. [Laughter.] The gentleman must have a very treacherous memory if he cannot recollect an event of that kind, because it did take place; and I think, if he will reflect a moment, he will recollect speaking to me at the door of the convention while the convention was in session.

Mr. KING. The special conversation to which the Senator alludes does not recur to me; but, as I stated to the Senator, that has always been my opinion, and I do not at all question the accuracy of his recollection. When I was appealed to I could not sustain it on special recollection, because such conversations have been so frequent with me that they may have occurred at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. So far as the action of the Senator from California is concerned, while a member of the Democratic party in the State of New York, at the time when I was myself a resident of that State, I acquit him fully of any charge of being even tainted with Free-Soilism, or any inclination to support the movement which was made by what was then denominated the radical Democracy of the State of New York. It is true that in that convention in 1847, when this question, which for the last ten years has been the question that, like Aaron's rod, has swallowed up all the rest, was first broached in the United States, the radical Democracy of New York met it at the threshold. The Government of the United States, through all its branches, its judiciary, its Congress, its executive departments, had from the beginning always exercised the unquestioned, and, in my judgment, the unquestionable power to restrict the extension of slavery into the Territories of the United States.

In 1846, the other House of Congress passed an act for that purpose. It came into this body, and but for the unfortunate speech of Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, who talked out the last hours of the session, it would have passed here. I do not speak on my own authority. I refer to the correspondence of Mr. Clay, who, writing to a friend from the Senate Chamber, declared, "the Wilmot proviso is about to pass the Senate." It was also well understood that General Cass, himself a member of this body, expressed his anxiety again and again to be permitted to record his vote in its favor. But on his way home, and shortly after he arrived there, it was well understood that the convention of the Democratic party was about to assemble at Baltimore; and that the delegates from some of the southern States were then being elected; and that they were elected under instructions that no man should receive the nomination for the Presidency, unless he was opposed to the Wilmot proviso. The Nicholson letter then made its appearance. Here, sir, in the history of events, and for the first time in this country, by any public man of any standing, was the heresy ever broached that Congress had no power to govern its own Territories, or to restrict the extension of slavery into them.

It was in reply to the declaration that no man should receive a nomination at the Democratic convention to be held at Baltimore, unless he was openly opposed to the Wilmot proviso, that the radical Democracy of New York, under the lead of the friends of the late Silas Wright, took their position. Yes, sir, they introduced the "cornerstone"—the resolution on which the true and radical Democracy have stood, and stand to-day—and when they came to Baltimore with their delegates, though it was thrown in their faces that they stood on that resolution, they did not shrink in that hour from declaring it.

Mr. BAYARD. I would appeal to the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. I withdrew my motion for an executive session, to give him an opportunity for a personal explanation in a matter with reference to himself.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. One single word further and I have done. In that convention this resolution was referred to. They stood upon it, and the declaration they then made is true to-day—whosoever falls on that stone will be broken in pieces, but on whomsoever it shall fall it will grind him to powder. General Cass fell on that stone and was broken, and woe be to the man, North or South, on whom it shall fall.

I beg pardon of the Senate and of the Senator who made the motion for an executive session, for occupying their time. It was no intention of mine to be called into a debate at this time, and perhaps I owe an apology to the Senate for speaking with as much warmth and earnestness as I have; but the allusion which the honorable Senator from California made, that I might have made such a proposition for the purpose of obtaining votes to the resolution—that I had promised offices to his party to produce that result—as it was a matter that had never entered into my mind, was one which I thought proper to say something about. I renew the motion for an executive session.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will state that there are two very important communications from the President on the table, which it is proper should be opened.

Mr. BROWN. I propose to dispose of this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Chair was about to suggest that according to usage and parliamentary rule, the pending question should be first disposed of before another motion intervenes.

Mr. BROWN. I rise for the purpose of moving a postponement of this question, and I avail myself of the courtesy of the Senator from Delaware to say that when the Senate shall meet again I shall have some views of my own to express on the matters involved in this debate. I desire simply to say now, on a single point, that I stand where I stood at the last session of Congress, and that nothing which transpired in Kansas on Monday last is to change my position. If the election on Monday was a fair one, as I hope it was, in which all parties were allowed freely and without hindrance to take part, and Kansas asks admission as a free State, I stand upon the record in favor of her admission. If, on the other hand, she asks admission as a slave State, I shall expect those who entered into the compact with us during the last session of Congress to abide by their pledges and vote for her admission.

As I intend to speak on the question, I feel it due to myself to say this in advance of any intelligence from Kansas. Of what may have transpired there on Monday, of course I know nothing, and no one else knows anything; but whatever it may have been, I am prepared to stand by it, if the election has been fair; that is, if a fair opportunity was offered to all parties to vote. If my friends have thought proper to retire voluntarily from the polls and allow the election to go by default, that is their business and it shall not change my policy here. If, on the other hand, the friends of other gentlemen have absented themselves from the polls and allowed the election to go by default, they ought not, in my judgment, to change their policy. What I wish to be understood as distinctly saying is, that so far as those who had the management of the election are concerned, they should have held the scales of justice in equal balance between the parties, and if all who desired to cast their ballots according to law had an opportunity to do so, whether they exercise the right or not, is a question which shall not weigh a feather on my mind.

Waiving that point, simply indicating that I have some purpose to express my views on the main questions, if no other Senator desires to ask the courtesy of the Senator from Delaware, I move the further postponement of this question until the 4th day of January, when the Senate will again be in session.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to make a correction of an error into which I fell yesterday, in regard to the constitution and schedule made at Leecompton. I find in the schedule, that the officers to carry the law into execution are required to be sworn, and are subject in the penalties provided in the territorial laws; but still I do not find that the returns are to be made in obedience to territorial laws. That part of my argument stands good as before; but so far as requiring them to be sworn, I find it is as stated by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CLAY. In reply, I will state, that if the Senator will read the section through, he will see that he is in error still.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject until the 4th of January was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter of the Secretary of State, in compliance with a resolution of the 17th instant, calling for copies of any correspondence which may have taken place between the Department of State and the British and French Ministers on the subject of claims for losses alleged to have been sustained by subjects of Great Britain at the bombardment of Greytown; which, on motion of Mr. SEWARD, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State, in answer to the resolutions of the Senate of the 16th and 18th instant, requesting correspondence and documents relative to the Territory of Kansas; which, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned to Monday, the 4th of January, 1858.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 23, 1857.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. P. D. GURLEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

QUALIFICATION OF A MEMBER.

Mr. HILL announced that his colleague, [Mr. TRIPPE,] who had been detained from the House by sickness in his family, was now present, and ready to be qualified.

Mr. ROBERT P. TRIPPE was then qualified, by taking the usual oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act to authorize the issue of Treasury notes; which was thereupon signed by the Speaker.

DELEGATE FROM UTAH.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to a question of privilege; and I will state the reason why I deem it a question of privilege. I desire to renew substantially the resolution attempted by me to be brought before this House some days since, in reference to the Delegate from Utah. I hold, and I believe the Chair will sustain me, that any resolution or proposition touching the right of any member or Delegate to a seat upon this floor, is at all times a question of privilege, and ought at all times to be received by this House.

Mr. BANKS. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not yet presented the resolution.

Mr. WARREN. I had hoped that no gentleman would object to the offering of a resolution such as I have indicated, even though it could not be regarded as a question of privilege. No man ought to object to it, for it is a matter every honest man ought to desire to be taken up by this House. It is an investigation which ought to be had. I send up the resolution, and while it is going up I will state that it is a proposition to investigate the right of the Delegate from Utah to occupy a seat upon this floor. It is abhorrent to every member of this House, that we should be sitting with the Delegate of a Territory in open rebellion, not only against the moral sentiment, but the legal Government of the country.

The resolution was reported, as follows:

Whereas, it appears from the proclamation of Brigham Young, late Governor of the Territory of Utah, from the President's message, and from later developments, that said Territory is now in a state of open rebellion against the Government of the United States: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to report the facts, and to inquire into the expediency of the immediate exclusion, from this floor, of the Delegate from said Territory.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would observe that the Delegate from Utah is not in his seat, and I think it proper that the resolution should be postponed until he is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the resolution is a privileged one.

Mr. WARREN. But a moment before I rose the Delegate from Utah was in his seat, and if he chooses to vacate it, it is not my fault. But I will press my resolution upon the House regardless of the Delegate from Utah or anybody else. It is a course which the Delegate expects; which every man in the country expects; and it is a subject which every member of this House should desire to have investigated.

Mr. BANKS. Is the resolution in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. BANKS. Upon what ground?

The SPEAKER. It pertains to the right of a member to his seat.

Mr. BANKS. Upon what ground, Mr. Speaker, is it made the privilege of a member of this House to declare, by resolution, that a state of war exists in any part of this Union, or that there is insurrection in any Territory? That certainly does not bring the matter before the House as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The subject-matter of the resolution, which is submitted to the consideration of the House, affects the right of a person who now occupies a seat upon this floor, to continue to occupy that seat.

Mr. BANKS. That is very true; but the facts upon which the gentleman predicates his resolution, do not affect the rights of that person. If the gentleman from Arkansas states as a fact, that the Delegate from Utah, as was stated by a gentleman from Alabama in the last Congress, in reference to the members from Massachusetts, is not entitled to his seat as a member of this House, and therefore ought to be expelled, I would admit that it would be a matter of privilege. But here the facts upon which he bases his conclusion do not affect the rights of the Delegate at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, upon the ground that the preamble may or may not be adopted by the House, while the resolution proposes an investigation of the right of a member to his seat, whether that right rests upon the facts stated in the preamble or not.

Mr. BANKS. I supposed the facts stated were embraced in the resolution itself.

Mr. BOGOCOCK. I have but a word or two to say in relation to this matter. I agree both with the Chair and with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] over the way. I think that inasmuch as the resolution, affects the right of a member of this House to a seat upon this floor, it is a question of personal privilege. Any member on this floor has a right to move a resolution to eject another member from the floor whenever he pleases, and that is a question of privilege. But it will be for the House afterwards to say whether the reason given for the action is a sufficient reason or not. Now, it may be that there is no sufficient reason given by the gentleman from Arkansas for ejecting the Delegate from Utah, and that he ought not to be ejected; but inasmuch as the resolution declares that the Delegate ought to be ejected from his seat upon this floor, that makes it a question of privilege.

I have no particular objection to the reference of this question to the Committee on Territories—and it was to that point that I rose to speak at this time—because I am willing that the Committee on Territories shall inquire into and report these facts to the House; and that is all the resolution asks. I am not prepared now, to say, and the House is not required to say, by voting to refer this matter to the Committee on Territories, either that the facts charged by the gentleman from Arkansas are correct, or that, being correct, they constitute a sufficient ground for the ejection of the Delegate from Utah. Sir, I am not prepared to say that because a member of the House rises and says that a Territory or a State is in a condition of moral rebellion against this Union, that, therefore, it ought not to be entitled to representation upon this floor. I am not prepared to say, even if the fact were true, that the moral sentiment of any State or of any Territory differed from the moral sentiment of my State, or the moral sentiment of this House, that such a fact would constitute a sufficient reason for ejecting its Representatives from this floor. I do not believe that this House can set itself up as a grand inquisition in regard to the religion or morals of any part of this country. We are not here for any such purpose. We cannot constitutionally declare that any State or Territory is in a condition of moral rebellion; and, therefore, not entitled to be heard upon this floor. But, sir, I do not see that any harm can result from leaving the matter with the Committee on Territories, to be inquired into and reported upon to the House.

The other proposition contained in the resolution is somewhat different. The gentleman charges in his preamble, or in the remarks which he made—I believe it is set forth in the preamble—that the Territory of Utah is in a condition of legal rebellion, of rebellion against the laws of the land. Well, whether, even if that were so, it would constitute a reason for ejecting its representative from this floor, is a question well worthy of inquiry by the lawyers and statesmen of this House. Sir, a large majority of the people of a State or Territory might be in rebellion; and yet, under the Constitution and laws of the country, are not those who are true and loyal entitled to be heard upon this floor? I am willing that the Committee on Territories shall take that question and inquire into it. But, sir, I deny that we have any facts before us now that would justify us in declaring that the Territory of Utah is in a condition of legal rebellion against this Government? Where is the authority for the declaration? Where is the message from the President or from any of the Executive Departments coming down to this House and declaring that the Territory of Utah is already in a condition of actual rebellion? What have we, I ask, to justify us in making any such declaration?

I merely rose, Mr. Speaker, to state that I am not prepared to say now that I concur in the facts stated by the gentleman from Arkansas, or that, even if those facts were verified, they would constitute a sufficient reason for the ejection of the Delegate from Utah from his seat upon this floor. I take it that it is a fair subject for inquiry; and all the gentleman from Arkansas asks is, that the Committee on Territories shall inquire into and report the facts to the House, with their recommendation for action. I am willing that that shall be done. And now, sir, if no other gentleman desires to address the House, I will move the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to say a few words.

Mr. BOCKOCK. Then I will not call the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I regard this movement as a very important one; and I think, under all the aspects of the case, that the time has not arrived even for the question of reference. I do not think that it is prudent, upon the part of the House, under all the circumstances of the case, to entertain this subject at all. It will be observed by the House that everything that Brigham Young has done thus far, he says that he has done in his capacity of civil Governor of Utah. The proclamation of which complaint is made appears as the proclamation of the Governor of Utah. While I am free to say that there is no probability that Mr. Young is deceived in the fact, and while I doubt not he knows that he is no longer Governor of Utah, there is a strong plausibility in the supposition, or a probability, that the people of the Territory of Utah may be deceived in the extent to which Brigham Young, as Governor, had a right to go. I have frequently thought that it would have been much more prudent upon the part of the new Governor to have met the proclamation of Brigham Young with a counter-proclamation to the people of Utah, showing the fact of his own appointment, of the deposition of Brigham Young by the President of the United States, and of his (Governor Cummins's) qualification in his new civic capacity, so as to have stripped from the shoulders of Brigham Young the cloak under which he is now acting, and to have thus placed the people who reside in the Territory of Utah, either in a position to have legally resisted Brigham Young, or in the undisguised attitude of rebellion. And I am free to say, also, that I think the distinguished Executive head of this country would have exhibited a greater degree of prudence if he had himself made this proclamation of which I speak to the people of Utah, so soon as he heard of the proclamation of Brigham Young.

We must notice the fact that what Young has done thus far, he has done under the cloak of his civil capacity. Nor am I advised, except by newspaper reports, that his successor has yet been qualified, or that that successor has yet officially communicated to Brigham Young the fact of his deposition from the office of Governor.

I agree entirely with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Bockock,] that we are not to look for the tenure of our seats in this Hall to the moral sentiment of the States or of the districts we represent. There are a large class of men in this country who believe in the doctrine of secession: now, suppose that a State of this Confederacy, carrying out that doctrine, had declared its intent to disobey and to resist a law which it deemed unconstitutional: would you concede the right, or would any gentleman from your latitude concede the right, to a reference of a resolution to a Committee of Elections, to a special committee, or to any other committee of the House, to ascertain whether, in view of this fact, and of the attitude assumed by such State, its Representatives should be expelled from this House? I recollect that, last year, the tables of the committee of which I am a member were burdened down with any number of memorials, coming from a large portion of the country, declaring slavery a violation of the Constitution.

Suppose that this Hall should exhibit such a disproportion in representation that there would be a majority of Representatives entertaining that opinion: would you concede the right to expel from this floor the Representatives of States where slavery exists, because it might be assumed that this was a violation of the Constitution?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not understand the resolution. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] whether it makes any allegation against the Delegate here? If people in Utah violate the law, that is no reason why the Delegate should be held to be false to his allegiance, or why he should be expelled from this House.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. As I understand the resolution, it is a proposition for reference, on the ground that the people of Utah are in rebellion.

Mr. BANKS. As I understand it, the resolution before the House is received on the ground that it states no facts.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. No; I understand it differently from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution for the information of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The resolution was again read, the preamble being omitted.

Mr. CLINGMAN. There is no ground stated at all.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Read the preamble. I understand this to be the state of facts: I understand the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WARREN] to offer the preamble and resolution. The Chair decides that the proposition is in order, because the House retains the liberty to reject the preamble and to pass the resolution; so that, for all the purposes of the reference, both are here. The preamble shows the rationale—the reason why the House is invited to adopt the resolution. Both, I suppose, will be referred together, because the resolution by itself has no meaning. It states no gravamen, suggests no hypothesis, recites no fact. It is the mere question, whether the Delegate from Utah shall be expelled? If you cut off the preamble, the committee would be, most certainly, awkwardly situated, as, without the suggestion of any ground, it would merely have the question referred as to the exclusion of the Delegate from Utah from his seat in this Hall.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask leave of the gentleman from Kentucky to have the preamble read. Does it make any allegation against the Delegate from Utah? If not, it seems to me there is nothing before the House at all.

The preamble was read.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I submit that that does not make any point. If it charged that the Delegate from Utah was false to the oath of allegiance which he has taken, that might be a reason for expelling him. But if these other people violate their obligations, I do not see that that raises any ground of expulsion against him.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I certainly agree with the gentleman from North Carolina in the matter of his suggestion, and I was exactly in the amplification of that idea when he interrupted me.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. With the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky, I will offer an amendment which will change somewhat the issue:

That the Committee on Territories be, and they are hereby, instructed to report a bill for the repeal of the organic act of the Territory of Utah, and to attach said Territory to other Territory or Territories, for judicial purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. As the Chair has ruled that amendment out of order, I will not fatigue the ear of the House by discussing it. It has no relation to the subject-matter. Nor will I longer stand in the way of gentlemen who seem to be so anxious about the proposition.

I want merely, in concluding, to remark that I do not think it will be prudent in the House, by acting against the Delegate from Utah, to take a step which may be the recognition of a state of rebellion in Utah; for, mark me, the gentlemen who are attached to this Administration, and the gentlemen who favor this Administration, will assume a very high responsibility whenever they adopt the fact that there is rebellion in Utah, and recognize the fact that the expedition sent to Utah was intended as a military expedition against Utah. I warn gentlemen not to fall into that error, by passing a resolution of this description. I understand the Administration to hold that the expedition which was sent to Utah in September, was designed merely to accompany the incoming civil officer, to escort him in safety, and to afford strength to him after his arrival, in the discharge of his proper civic functions. And I warn gentlemen that it will be necessary for them to take that position in regard to this expedition before the session closes. I do not want the House, by rushing into a precipitate conclusion, bearing on the Delegate from Utah, to either recognize rebellion as the status of the Territory of Utah, or to prejudice the question, that must come before it appropriately hereafter, in reference to the army of this country marching against Utah. I do not myself believe that the House ought now to entertain the subject at all. We have not heard, this session, from the Delegate from Utah. He has not opened his mouth here during the session. He has no suggestion from Utah to make to the General Government. He is doing us no harm.

I think, in fact, Mr. Speaker, that as time wears on, we may want the Delegate from Utah here. He may have a good deal of information we shall want. If he is a true man to his country he will communicate it. I confess that for one, as a member of the Military Committee of this House, I would rather he were here than not; and at all events, I am not willing, under all the circumstances, to ignore by this movement the rights of those of his constituents who may be true, or to recognize a state of war with Utah.

Mr. WHITELEY. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRIS] to propose to instruct the Committee on Territories absolutely to report a bill to abolish the territorial government of Utah.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois was ruled to be out of order.

Mr. WHITELEY. I desire to offer an amendment relating to the point. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following:

And that they also be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill for abolishing the territorial government of Utah.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman is not in order, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I think this resolution ought not to be adopted, even for the purpose of inquiry. I think, under the law of this country and the view that our Constitution takes, that we are not here entitled to assume that any Territory is in a state of rebellion, or that any State is making resistance to the General Government. If there is resistance in either a Territory or State, it is not in the eye of the law, and cannot be a resistance of the legal authorities of the Territory, and therefore cannot be regarded as the resistance of the Territory itself; but certain evil-disposed persons within the limits of the Territory, under the guise of its authority, are resisting the laws that bind them.

The preamble and resolution not only ignore that first principle of American government, but they assume the fact that the representative of the Territory of Utah on this floor is the representative of that rebellious government, and not the representative of the citizens of the United States who elected him and sent him here; and, consequently, unless gentlemen are ready to abandon the American views of the relations of citizens to the Government, and of the organized Territories to the Government, they cannot vote for that resolution.

It may, at another stage of our proceeding, be an appropriate subject of inquiry, whether there be an illegal and organized combination of evil disposed citizens, who have banded themselves together to resist the authority of the United States, as well as the local authority of the Territory. But when we shall have come to the conclusion that there is such an evil-disposed combination, it leaves still every single local officer of the United States in full possession of his authority. But, if it shall be ascertained that any of these officers have so far departed from the line of their duty as to take any part in that rebellion, it will afford sufficient ground for removal on the part of the President, and for filling the office so vacated. That, sir, is the only legal view which can be taken of the matter; and it was in that point of view that the President of the United States, having ascertained that Brigham Young had failed in his allegiance to the Government of the United States has removed him and appointed another in his place.

When he has reached there what will he do? Will there be any Territory of Utah over which Mr. Cummins can act as Governor? Will there be any people there over which the laws of the United States should extend their protection? Will he go there with military power to rule as a satrap rules over an eastern kingdom? Or does he not go there under the laws of the United States, for the purpose of executing the laws of the United States, by sheriff and constable—carrying, it is true, a military force at his back; but only to act as a posse comitatus; having no power except to aid the civil authorities in the execution of the laws of the United States? I say that is the legal and American view of the resolution. Any force that the President of the United States may send there, is under the authority of the law of Congress which gives him the power to use the military and militia of the United States to enforce the execution of the laws, and to maintain the local authorities there. And even though the citizens there should refuse to obey the laws of the United States and of the Territory, still they are not to be dealt with by military violence. They are to be arrested and brought before the judicial tribunals of the country, and not tried before a court-martial. I say, therefore, that there can be no such thing as war against the United States by a Territory of the United States; and I say that to adopt this preamble and resolution is directly in the face of the legal facts, and without any precedent in our history—one that ought not to be entertained, even for the purpose of investigation.

Mr. Speaker, let us go one step further: This is brought before us as a matter of privilege, as affecting the seat of the Delegate from Utah. Sir, if that gentleman has directly or indirectly countenanced or aided any illegal combination against the laws of the United States, then he is unworthy of a seat here, and should be expelled. But if he himself has not taken part in any rebellion, then, though that rebellion should include every citizen in the Territory except one, still he stands here as the representative of the legal rights of that one man in that Territory. Nay, sir, he stands here as the representative of the rebellious children of the Republic. He stands here to see that those who have committed treason shall be tried fairly under the Constitution and laws of the United States. He stands here to see that the laws are carried out which protect the man who has been guilty of treason from the outrage and violence which military authorities visit upon political offenders. I say, therefore, that, although every man in that Territory should be a rebel and in arms against the United States, they are entitled to their representative upon this floor; for, although they are rebels, they have not ceased to be citizens of the Republic. Though there may be rebellion in the Territory of Utah, no gentleman has charged that the gentleman from Utah has aided in any manner, directly or indirectly, the rebellious proceeding in that Territory. I think the proposition is one which should not, at this time, be entertained, and I therefore move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. WARREN. I appeal to the gentleman from Maryland to withdraw the motion to lay on he table for a moment.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the gentleman from Maryland to withdraw his motion for a moment, and I will renew it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say—

Mr. WARREN. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Maryland heard the proposition I made to him? I asked the gentleman, having made the motion to lay upon the table this proposition, to indulge me for a moment, and then I would yield the floor to the gentleman from Maryland, and he could withdraw his motion in favor of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BANKS. I have the floor, assigned me by the Chair, and I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas, by the leave of the House, in a moment or two.

As an objector to the reception of the resolution, I desire to say that there is no member of this House that will more cheerfully enter into any inquiry into the condition of the Territory, its government, or its people, that is proper and within the powers of Congress. Congress has authority to declare war; it has authority to inquire into the condition of Utah, or any other Territory, upon the facts stated in the President's message. It has power to enlarge the Army, to raise additional regiments, as recommended by the President. Now, sir, there is no proposition which the gentleman from Arkansas, or any other member of this House can make, which relates to the legitimate course of the Government in relation to the alleged rebellion in that Territory, to which I will not most cheerfully assent. But I object to this resolution upon the ground that there is not a sufficient statement of fact to justify our proceeding against a member or Delegate in regard to his right to a seat. There is nothing more sacred to the people of a State, or to the people of a Territory, than their right of representation; and it should be the very last thing upon which we should make an assault. We ought to exhaust every other remedy, and pursue every other means, before we assail the rights of the people of a State or Territory through their representation on this floor. The question has been raised before, and will be raised again.

Now, sir, we have nothing to fear from the influence or power of the Delegate from Utah. He has no vote. He can exert no moral influence. The people he represents are weak, and distant. The opinion of the civilized world is against them.

And beyond that, sir, if we adopt the resolution, and agree to the expulsion, it results in nothing. The people, in the course of a month or two, may send another Delegate to occupy his place. We ought, therefore, to consider, upon the President's message, what course should be taken by the Government of this country in regard to the action of that Territory; and any measure which may be proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas upon this matter, I will cheerfully agree to.

I ask the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas to this declaration in the message of the President. He says:

"Governor Young has, by proclamation, declared his determination to maintain his power by force, and has already committed acts of hostility against the United States. Unless he should retrace his steps the Territory of Utah will be in open rebellion."

He does not charge that open rebellion exists. He says that Governor Young has threatened rebellion, and intimates that these threats may be idle boasting, but that we should not pass them by in silence. He therefore recommends that additional regiments should be raised, in view of the state of affairs in that Territory. Now, if the gentleman from Arkansas will confine his resolution to the recommendation of the President, or take any other legitimate course, in regard to the people of Utah, I will cheerfully give him all the aid in my power. But, for one, I protest against any assault upon the rights of a Delegate from a Territory, or a member from a State, except it be upon the statement of facts touching him directly in his acts here, as a member of the House.

I have finished all I desired to say, and will yield the floor, with the consent of the House, to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WARREN. In order to meet the views of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, and as all I desire is an investigation of this matter, I propose a substitute for the resolution I offered. I think it will cover the objections of gentlemen upon the other side.

The resolution was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to inquire into the difficulties now existing between the United States Government and the territorial government of Utah; and the said committee will further inquire whether, under existing circumstances, the said Territory shall be allowed to have a Delegate in this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels constrained to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. BANKS. I had finished what I had to say, and, according to my promise to the gentleman from Maryland, I submit the motion to lay the original resolution upon the table.

Mr. WARREN. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts not to make that motion. I understood him to say that the motion was not to be submitted until I had made some remarks.

Mr. BANKS. With the consent of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WARREN. Notwithstanding the objections on the other side of the House, I am still desirous of pressing it. Not that I am wedded to the resolution I have introduced—not at all. My object is to get an investigation of this House on the matter presented in that resolution, whether in that shape or another.

It strikes me, sir, with some force, that the gentlemen across the way are attaching too much importance to this resolution, and though the subject of this resolution is important in itself, yet gentlemen talk as though the resolution proposed to expel the Delegate from Utah, without giving him any showing. Such a proposition was never contemplated by my resolution. It simply proposes to investigate the facts alluded to in the preamble. It simply proposes to investigate the right of the party in question upon this floor. Now, sir, is it true, in point of fact, that before a committee of investigation of this character should be raised, the facts upon which it is proposed to be raised should be submitted to the House? No, sir. I apprehend that this investigation is to be had before the committee, and upon the facts which may appear the committee are required to report. Again, I say, gentlemen talk as though the adoption of this resolution would be the expulsion of the gentleman from Utah without a hearing. If gentlemen will look to the resolution they will see that it simply refers the matter to a committee whose duty it is to investigate the subject, and it is the province of the House to judge whether he is entitled to his seat or not.

Now, it is known to you that the present position of Utah is exciting the whole country, and the whole country is perfectly amazed that gentlemen from the North, South, East, and West, will sit with the Delegate as an equal upon this floor. That is the prime reason that induces me, at this stage of the proceedings, to introduce this resolution. It is an attempt, say gentlemen, to strike at the moral depravity that prevails in that Territory. Would to God I had the power to do so, and I would have done it when a member of the Thirty-Third Congress. It is true, from the proclamation of Brigham Young, and from the message of the President, that that country is in open rebellion against the Government of the United States; and yet gentlemen say we are too soon; that we are hasty, and are not proceeding rightly. Let gentlemen suggest a better mode of procedure, and I will be with them, for I am not wedded to this resolution. But, sir, I do insist on the proposition to investigate the right of this Delegate to a seat, as my equal, upon this floor.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to say to the gentleman that I have been trying to get the floor for the purpose of suggesting a substitute, which will accomplish the object he desires. I will say to the gentleman that my constituents are deeply interested in this matter. There are a great many Mormons in the district that I represent; some of them belong to the party with which the gentleman is connected, and are the publishers of a newspaper on the frontier. I ask the gentleman to allow me to submit a substitute for his resolution, which will remove the legal objection, and bring down upon the Mormons the justice they require.

Mr. WARREN. No, sir; I decline to yield.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read for information.

Mr. WARREN. Very well, sir; I yield for that purpose.

The substitute was then read for information, and is as follows:

That the Committee on Territories be instructed to examine and report on the expediency of repealing the law organizing the Territory of Utah, and the passage of a bill organizing the Territory of Nevada and the Territory of Columbus.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that the reason why I was disposed to object to the reading of that substitute for information, was in consequence of the remark that he saw fit to let fall in reference to the party to which I belong, and with which I act. The gentleman need not tell me that Mormons edit a Democratic newspaper with a view of driving me from what I believe to be my duty in this behalf. If a Mormon edits a Democratic newspaper, or a paper called a Democratic paper, I will say to the gentleman that he does not belong to that school of Democracy that has so long governed and controlled this country, and brought it to its present state of prosperity.

But, sir, I was going on to say that I objected seriously to a postponement of this matter, and that I believed it was the duty of each member upon this floor, regardless of political sentiment, to vote for this inquiry. I do not put this in as a great political question; I put it in as a great constitutional right reserved to this people. Whoever heard of a Delegate being received from a Territory or from a State that is in open rebellion against the Government? I do not introduce this particularly as a Democratic measure, or an American measure, or a Republican measure, but I have introduced it because I believe it to be the duty of every good citizen, whether in Congress or out of Congress, to raise his voice in opposition to any such proceedings as are now going on, and as have been carried on in Utah for many months.

But I go further. I say to gentlemen that I believe there has been too much want of investigation of the right of members to seats upon this floor. I say that I stand here prepared to vote not only to exclude the Delegate from Utah, if, upon an investigation, it shall turn out that his Territory is, and was at the time of his election, in rebellion against this Government, but I am here prepared to vote to exclude any gentleman who occupies a seat upon this floor, where the free white voters of his district were not permitted to go to the polls untrammelled and cast their votes, as white men and freemen under our Constitution and laws ought ever to have a right to do. I believe, sir, in a full and fair investigation of matters of this kind; and so long as I occupy a position upon this floor, I will advocate it whether in reference to the Delegate from Utah, or whether in reference to a Representative from any State in the Union. I therefore press this resolution; but if gentlemen can suggest any amendment that will put it in a better shape, and still accomplish the purpose I have in view, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. BOYCE. I sympathize, Mr. Speaker, in the zeal which the honorable member from Arkansas has manifested. No person, perhaps, has less sympathy with the Mormons than I have. I look upon them as a blot upon the civilization of the age. But, at the same time, in the spirit of Lord Chatham, whose remark I think it was, "I would not violate the smallest principle of law to oppress the meanest man in England." Though I have no respect for that peculiar people, yet, in my opinion, we cannot take the course indicated by this resolution, without violating great principles of law, which are of more importance to the public good than any supposed advantage to be gained by depriving the Delegate from Utah of his seat.

Sir, how does the Delegate from Utah have a right to his seat? It is not under a resolution of this House. It is under a law of the land, passed by both Houses, and signed by the President, and then by a legal election in pursuance of that law. It was by that election, then, under that law, that he acquired a right to a seat upon this floor. Admit, then, for the sake of argument, that Utah is in a state of rebellion: does the lawless conduct of the people of Utah deprive that Delegate of his right to a seat here, acquired previously, in due course of law? Why, certainly not. Nothing they could do would divest him of that right—that right having been acquired by a legal election held under the law of the land, and which could not be revoked by any lawful action on the part of the people of Utah, much less forfeited by their lawless proceedings.

It seems to me that this proceeding gives an undue importance to Brigham Young. It seems to acknowledge that Brigham Young is Utah. I am not willing to assign him any such position. I do not know that Brigham Young is Utah. There may be many people in Utah who do not believe in Brigham Young. He is a bad man. He has, doubtless, by various pretenses, imposed upon a large majority of the people of that Territory; but is his ipse dixit to be received as the voice of Utah? I apprehend not.

It seems to me that this question of Utah is one of the gravest questions that can possibly come before us. This Government is a Government of internal peace and law and order, and not of violence. We are going to have before us, in this question of Utah, a question which will demand the most serious consideration of both Houses of Congress.

I think we should, at a proper time, take up this whole question of Utah, in all its relations, and not now upon the isolated point of the expulsion of the Delegate. My idea is, that when the question comes up properly, we are not to assume that Utah is in a state of war, and to make war upon the whole Territory. We are rather to ignore the action of Brigham Young, to deal as if peace existed there, to carry out the laws, to carry them out by force, if it becomes absolutely necessary, but not to dignify Brigham Young and his self-proclaimed government into the importance of a hostile State by declaring war upon them. I hope that by prudence this question may lose some of its gigantic proportions, because I should look upon it as one of the most unfortunate steps the country could be obliged to take, if we should be compelled, at this day, to shed fraternal blood upon our soil. I trust that prudent, though firm, counsels may prevail. I expect much from the wisdom of the President. And I trust that the good genius of the Republic may avert the sad spectacle of American blood shed American hands. It would be the beginning, indeed, of a sad chapter in our history. With these remarks I leave the question for the present.

Mr. COLFAX. I dislike, Mr. Speaker, to dissent from the views which have been so ably presented by distinguished gentlemen, who are emphatically leaders of this House, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOGOCCK,] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] but I think that the self-respect of the American Congress, the representatives of twenty-five millions of American freemen, demands at least that this investigation should be had.

Gentlemen say that this resolution is extraordinary in its character. If so, sir, it is introduced for the purpose of meeting an extraordinary state of affairs, anomalous in its character, and without precedent in the history of this nation. I say nothing in regard to the immoral practices which prevail in the Territory of Utah, and have made that Territory a byword and reproach in all Christendom. But I desire to speak of the civil state of affairs there, and of her relations towards the General Government. What are they? Do we not know, sir—is it not a fact that has been proclaimed throughout this broad land, officially, and in every other way in which it could reach the public ear—that the authority of the United States has been openly defied and trampled under foot there, that your United States courts have been broken up, and that the United States officers have been compelled to leave the Territory, some of them fleeing from it for their lives? Is it not known that the people of the Territory are in hostile array against the army of the United States, cutting off the Government trains, and warning, officially, through their treasonable Governor, the Army of the United States not to set foot in the Territory, except upon condition of laying down their arms? While they throw off entirely, as a whole body, their allegiance to the General Government, they, at the same time, have the presumption to come here and demand that they shall be represented upon the floor of the council-hall of the nation against which they have stretched forth the gauntleted hand of defiance, and whose authority they have openly defied and scorned.

The President's message tells us the condition of affairs in the Territory of Utah. He says:

"Without entering upon a minute history of occurrences, it is sufficient to say that all the officers of the United States, judicial and executive, with the single exception of two Indian agents, have found it necessary, for their own personal safety, to withdraw from the Territory, and there no longer remains any government in Utah but the despotism of Brigham Young."

And yet, with this condition of affairs, officially proclaimed to us by the chief Executive of the nation, we are hesitating here, whether we shall pass a mere resolution of inquiry on the subject, which, it seems to me, the self-respect of Congress demands.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman from Indiana have the kindness to read the conclusion of the President's remarks, referring to the restoration of the government under the Constitution and laws?

Mr. COLFAX. I will, with pleasure.

"Governor Young has, by proclamation, declared his determination to maintain his power by force, and has already commenced acts of hostility against the United States. Unless he should retrace his steps, the Territory of Utah will be in a state of open rebellion."

Now, I desire to read something more:

"He has, therefore, for several years, in order to maintain his independence, been industriously employed in collecting and fabricating arms and munitions of war, and in disciplining the Mormons for military service. As superintendent of Indian affairs, he has had an opportunity of tampering with the Indian tribes, and exciting their hostile feelings against the United States; this, according to our information, he has accomplished, in regard to some of these tribes, while others have remained true to their allegiance, and have communicated his intrigues to our Indian agents. He has laid in a store of provisions for three years, which, in case of necessity, as he informed Major Van Vliet, he will conceal, 'and then take to the mountains, and bid defiance to all the powers of the Government.'"

And sir, since that message was written the news has come from the Territory of Utah that the military equipage, and arms and munitions of war, accompanying the force on that frontier, were cut off by these Mormons, openly and insultingly.

Now there has not been a mere declared intent to oppose the Government of the United States; but it has been actually carried into effect. And we are to say here whether a people like this, having openly and defiantly and insultingly thrown off all allegiance to the General Government; having sent a message through their Legislative Assembly, to the President, that they will have such and such men as officers and no others; having thus disrobed themselves of their allegiance to the Government, shall be allowed to send their representatives here with equal rights, as to his speaking, with ourselves, to occupy a seat on this floor as our peer, and to draw his salary and per diem from the Treasury of the United States? The matter has been trifled with too long. This Brigham Young has been making treasonable threats against the General Government from the days of the administration of Mr. Fillmore to the present day; and he has over and over again declared publicly in the face of the assembled people, that he will be the Governor of Utah, not so long as the Government of the United States may see fit, but so long as God says he shall be Governor, declaring that he derives his commission from God instead of from the President. He has gone on fostering rebellion, till it has broken out into open war. And yet he sends, with credentials signed by the same hand which penned his proclamation of defiance to our Government, a representative here; and we are not to be allowed, because, forsooth, there has been no precedent for it, to have a committee of inquiry to ascertain if we cannot purge ourselves from the presence of a Delegate from such a Territory! I trust the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have no objection to the passage of the resolution, as it has been entertained by the Chair as a question of privilege. I did not raise the question, although I do not think it involves any question of privilege. But as the Chair entertained it, I have no objection to the resolution being passed by this House, as the Committee on Territories will certainly inquire into all these subjects, whether the resolution pass or not. I take occasion to state distinctly that I do not think that any fact embraced in the preamble or the resolution involves a question of privilege. I move the previous question, thinking that we have had discussion enough.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. KEITT. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to ask what was done with the last proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN?]

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled it out of order.

Mr. BANKS. It seems to me that that resolution could be received after the first was admitted before the House. I think that it was competent—the House being already in possession of the subject—to admit the last resolution of the gentleman from Arkansas, and I thought that that was to be done. I cheerfully assent to that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled the last resolution out of order, because its reading shows, in the estimation of the Chair, that it would not be a question of privilege at all.

Mr. BANKS. It was not a question of privilege; but I think it might have been admitted as an amendment, after the subject was legitimately before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled it out, and it is too late now to make a question about it.

Mr. BANKS. I do not make a question about it.

The main question was ordered to be put. The question being on the motion to lay the resolution on the table—

Mr. MILLSON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to make an inquiry for information. It is this: if this Delegate should be turned out, would not, under the law organizing the Territory of Utah, another election necessarily follow, and another Delegate be sent here from the same Territory?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 118; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Banks, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bliss, Boyce, Brayton, Bryan, Burlingame, Campbell, Case, Clawson, Glingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Comins, Burton Craige, Curry, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dowdell, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Horton, Howard, Keitt, Kilgore, Lamar, Leiter, Lovejoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Palmer, Pendleton, Potter, Pottle, Quitman, Robbins, Roberts, Sandidge, Judson W. Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippie, Underwood, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburne, and Israel Washburne—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bowie, Buffinton, Burnett, Burroughs, Caskie, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Colfax, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curtis, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Elliott, Eustis, Faley, Garret, Giddings, Guntrell, Gillis, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Harlan, Hatch, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Letcher, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Niblack, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Purviance, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ritchie, Royce, Rufin, Russell, Savage, Scales, Scott, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Thayer, Wade, Waldron, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—118.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Pending the vote—

Mr. FLORENCE said: Condemning Brigham Young's course as much as any man does, I do not think that this is quite the way to punish him. I vote "ay."

Mr. ENGLISH said that he was not present when his name was called. If he had been, he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. WHITELEY said: I wish to know, Mr. Speaker, whether, if the Delegate from Utah be removed, there will not be time to break up the government of that Territory before a new election can be held, and another Delegate can be sent here? Without waiting for an answer, I vote "no."

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it competent for me to ask a division of the resolution from the preamble?

The SPEAKER. The question will be stated separately on each; first on the resolution, and afterwards on the preamble.

The question was taken on the resolution; and it was adopted.

Mr. WARREN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. WARREN. I suppose I have said enough in regard to the preamble. My object was to get up the investigation. Although the preamble gives more sense to the resolution, I care nothing about it. I move the previous question on the preamble.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I did not hear the resolution very distinctly; and I would ask, if the House now reject the preamble, to what Territory or to what Delegate will the resolution refer?

The SPEAKER. That is not a matter for the Chair to determine.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I want to understand it before I vote.

The preamble was again read.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I want to know what Delegate or Territory the resolution will have reference to, if the House does not adopt the preamble.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be again read.

Mr. GROW. What is it to be read for, when it is adopted?

The SPEAKER. If objection be made it cannot be read.

Mr. WARREN. It is immaterial whether it be read or not. I can state it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The gentleman from Arkansas has called the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suggest that the gentleman from Arkansas withdraw the previous question, and amend his preamble.

Mr. WARREN. I was going to say that, to satisfy the gentleman, I will withdraw the previous question till I can state the fact in regard to the resolution.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order.

Was not the previous question seconded on the preamble as well as on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. According to the practice of the House, as pursued last Congress and before, the previous question does not apply to the preamble. The Chair will follow the precedent set in that case.

Mr. WARREN. I hope I will be permitted to say to gentlemen that it is true that the term "Territory of Utah" does not occur in the resolution, and therefore it may be necessary to pass the preamble. I cannot, however, for the life of me, see any objection to the passage of the preamble. It is a mere reiteration of facts known to every gentleman on this floor. It simply states, almost verbatim, what is stated by the proclamation of Brigham Young, and verbatim what is stated in the message of the President—nothing more nor less. And, if gentlemen were disposed to vote for the resolution to make this investigation, I cannot see that it will do them or the committee any harm for the preamble to go with it. This would be a new way of defeating a resolution. It is true, the resolution, without the preamble, would appear foolish, the Territory of Utah not being designated in it by name. If it had been, I would not care a groat for the preamble, because, as I have often said before, I say again, my only object was to get up an investigation of this matter.

But, sir, if gentlemen intend to send this thing to the committee, they may as well send it in an intelligible form, so that the committee may understand it. I therefore hope the House will sustain and pass the preamble, and let it go to the committee. It can do the committee no harm; it can do the House no harm, and it can do the country no harm. I demand the previous question.

Mr. MILLSON. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and allow me to suggest an amendment or substitute for the preamble, which, I think, will be satisfactory to all.

Mr. WARREN. I do not withdraw the demand.

Mr. MILLSON. I ask the gentleman at least to withdraw the call, that he may hear the suggestion which I have to make.

Mr. WARREN. There are forty gentlemen around me who also desire to make suggestions, and if I withdraw for one I must for others. However, I will hear the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. MILLSON. I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his preamble, so as to make it read something like this:

Whereas, it appears from the message of the President of the United States that many persons in the Territory of Utah are in a state of open rebellion; and, whereas, it may be that John M. Bernhisel, the Delegate from that Territory, has been connected with that rebellion—

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman need not proceed further. I will say to him that I cannot accept such a modification. It would defeat my whole object. I insist on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the gentleman from Arkansas to withdraw his demand for a moment.

Mr. WARREN. I decline to withdraw further. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays on the preamble.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Bishop, Blair, Bowie, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Colfax, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curtis, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Elliott, English, Eustis, Faley, Garret, Gillis, Greenwood, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, John C. Kunkel, Letcher, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Parker, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Purviance, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ritchie, Roberts, Royce, Rufin, Russell, Scales, Scott, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Thayer, Trippie, Wade, Ward, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Banks, Barksdale, Bliss, Boock, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burlingame, Burroughs, Campbell, Case, Caskie, Chaffee, Clawson, Comins, Burton Craige, Curry, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodie, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Jewett, Knapp, Leiter, Lovejoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Miles, Millson, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Pendleton, Pettit, Potter, Powell, Quitman, Robbins, Sandidge, Savage, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, and Cadwalader C. Washburne—76.

So the preamble was adopted.

Pending the call of the roll—

Mr. ENGLISH stated that he had misunderstood the question when taken on the adoption of the resolution. He would have voted against the motion to lay on the table and in favor of the resolution.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. J. B. Henry, his Private Secretary, announcing that he had approved and signed the members' compensation bill.

Mr. KEITT. I voted in the affirmative, Mr. Speaker, with a view of moving that the vote by which the resolution was adopted be reconsidered. But, sir, in deference to my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN,] who by courtesy had the right to make the motion, at the close of some remarks which I propose to make I will move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

My objection to the preamble arises out of a want of conformity to the facts existing in Utah which are taken as the basis upon which the preamble is founded. It charges that, from the proclamation of Brigham Young, from the message of the President of the United States, and from some subsequent developments, it is shown there is rebellion in the Territory of Utah. Of the proclamation of Governor Young I have no official information. I may have seen it or I may not. I do remember to have seen some fugitive commentaries in the newspapers upon this proclamation; but I apprehend there is no member of this House who has an authenticated copy of it. But, sir, this House has no right to say, upon the authority of mere fugitive newspaper rumors, that such a proclamation has been issued by Governor Young. So much for the proclamation.

Now about the message of the President of the United States. He says their actions are in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and are the proper subjects for the jurisdiction of the civil magistrate. What actions? Actions amounting to rebellion? When committed? and by what authority? The President says that Governor Young in his proclamation declared his intention to maintain his power by force, and that the people of Utah have already committed acts of hostility against the United States. Acts amounting to rebellion? The President himself has pronounced his decision upon the matter that unless Brigham Young retrace his steps, the Territory of Utah will be in open rebellion. But no act, according to the message of the President of the United States, has yet been committed which amounts to rebellion. Well, sir, what subsequent developments—what authentic official documents have you had of any rebellion in Utah? None. And I ask again whether, upon mere fugitive accounts of a proclamation by Brigham Young, we are to assume that there is a rebellion in that Territory? Are you going to assume upon a state of facts which the President himself says do not amount to rebellion? If you cannot do that, I ask upon what authority do you adopt this preamble, asserting that there is rebellion there?

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a single question. He tells us that the only evidence we have of this proclamation of Governor Young is a mere rumor floating about in the newspapers. I refer the gentleman to the message of the President of the United States, and ask him if the President does not state that Governor Young has issued a proclamation declaring his intention to maintain his power by force?

Mr. KEITT. I saw it here, and I attach all the importance to it which legitimately belongs to it. But to what extent does this declaration go? Has not the President of the United States sent a regiment or two to Utah? If he believed that Brigham Young intended to maintain his authority by force—if he believed that he intended to commit acts of hostility against the Federal authority—would he have sent a single regiment or two under the circumstances? Does not he come to us now, and ask us for an increase of the military force of the country, in order to test whether Brigham Young does mean to maintain his authority by force? If he believed this declaration was a declaration of war, why did not he say so, and why did he not send a force adequate to meet the exigency? I take the practical commentary which the President makes upon his own declaration; and as I do not find the proclamation spread out in the message, I say that I do not yet know what that proclamation is.

I go a step further. Suppose there is rebellion there. Rebellion against what? Against the constituted authorities? Who are the constituted authorities? The Federal officers. What have they called upon you for? If they have called upon you for anything, it has been for troops to repress this rebellion. If there could be rebellion, what could you do? Why, crush it out, and then make those who committed the act amenable to the laws. You should enforce the laws; but this is not the way to do it. What, sir, is the very character of this Government? A representative polity. Sir, the idea of representation is essential to the very structure and organization of the Government. Whom do you represent?

Mr. SEWARD. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. KEITT. Certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. I should like the gentleman from South Carolina to inform me by what authority of the Constitution of the United States the Delegate of a Territory holds his seat upon this floor, and is equal to the gentleman from South Carolina under the Constitution?

Mr. KEITT. Whenever I raise that question, I will answer it.

Mr. SEWARD. A very convenient way to dodge the question. The gentleman raised that point, and a number of others.

Mr. KEITT. I was saying this: that representation was essential to the very polity and structure of the Government; and I asked you whom you, or any gentleman upon this floor, represent? and I was about to say, not a few scattered and disbanded individuals. You represent a system. You represent a political organization, and not mere individuals; and I meant then to say that, if that Territory was in rebellion—if it was our Territory and within our jurisdiction, and the Delegate from Utah was the only true man upon all the soil, and not in rebellion, under your laws and in conformity to the structure of your Government, he has a right to a seat on this floor. He neither represents a mere man in rebellion, or out of rebellion. He represents a political system; and while that political system exists, he has a right to a seat upon this floor.

Now, sir, I come to the question of the gentleman from Georgia. Politically he is not my equal. He cannot vote. He represents a system inferior, one which revolves within the circle of the States. He is not here by the Constitution of the United States, but he is here by the organic act of your Territory and through the courtesy of a statute law.

Mr. SEWARD. He is then but an agent of the Territory of Utah?

Mr. KEITT. Unquestionably.

Mr. SEWARD. If, then, a mischievous agent is hurtful to this Government, cannot we dispose of him?

Mr. KEITT. He is here, in the first place, by the law of the land; and in the second place there is no charge against him. That is the answer.

I mean to say that this House, with the consent of the Senate, may repeal the organic act of that Territory. But, sir, in the country there are three schools upon the question. One thinks that, by some geological property in the dirt, or some pneumatic essence in the air, the people of a Territory are vested with indefeasible sovereignty. That school cannot consistently vote to repeal or abolish the territorial act.

There is another school which believes that Congress is sovereign; that it can establish what form of government it pleases in a Territory; that it can build up classes and distribute titles to anybody. It believes in the omnipotence of the Federal Government.

There is another class who pretermit the question of the origin of our right over the Territories; and who believe that its exercise is restricted by the very structure of the Government. That class believes that the Federal Government is the agent of the States.

I do not mean to discuss this question at large. I merely wish to put myself right. I really think this House has involved itself in something of a contradiction. Yesterday we declared that the House should adjourn for ten days; and to-day, under a resolution offered by the gentleman from Arkansas, we declare that war exists. We say that Utah is in a state of rebellion; that that Territory should be subjected; and we adjourn for ten days, and thus cut the very sinews of war. If it is true that a war does exist, should we adjourn for ten days? and if we do not believe that it exists, should we declare in a resolution that it does?

I intended, at one time, to discuss this measure more at large; but as I understand that other business of grave importance, which will carry us to other scenes, will be before the House when this matter is disposed of, I do not choose, both from considerations of its nature, and because of delay, to discuss the matter further. Therefore I move, though opposed to the whole thing, to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. PETTIT obtained the floor.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HALL, ETC.

Mr. FAULKNER. As I understand that the purpose for which the gentleman has arisen involves an adjournment of the House, I ask him to permit me, before he proceeds, to make a report from the select committee, concerning some matters affecting the organization of the House and the arrangement of the Hall.

Mr. PETTIT. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have been instructed by the select committee to make a partial report at this time. I ask that it may be read.

The report was read, and is as follows:

1. Resolved, That the Speaker assign portions of the galleries for the use of the press, for the foreign ministers, and for a ladies' gallery.
2. Resolved, That the south lobby, and the east and west lobbies, south of the principal staircases, be reserved for the use of members and persons admitted to the floor of the Hall.

3. Resolved, That the superintendent cause the reporters' gallery to be properly fitted up with desks and seats, and conveniences for writing and taking notes.

4. Resolved, That the telegraph and reporters' room be reserved for the use of the telegraphic companies and reporters.

5. Resolved, That the superintendent cause the shelves to be removed from the rooms now occupied as document rooms, and cause the rooms to be fitted up as coat and cloak rooms.

6. Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be authorized to appoint six additional assistant doorkeepers, or messengers, at the lowest rate of compensation now provided for such officers, and also to appoint six additional laborers at a compensation of $1 50 a day.

7. Resolved, That the 17th, 18th, and 19th rules of the House be rescinded, and that the following be adopted as additional rules in lieu thereof:

Rule 17. That no person except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, the President's Private Secretary, the Governor for the time being of any State, and the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Rule 18. Stenographers and reporters, other than the official reporters of the House, wishing to take down the debates, may be admitted by the Speaker to the reporters' gallery over the Speaker's chair, but not on the floor of the House; but no person shall be allowed the privileges of said gallery under the character of stenographer or reporter, without a written permission of the Speaker, specifying the part of the said gallery assigned to him; nor shall said stenographer or reporter be admitted to said gallery unless he shall state in writing for what paper or papers he is employed to report; nor shall he be admitted, or, if admitted, be suffered to retain his seat, if he shall be or become an agent to prosecute any claim pending before Congress, and the Speaker shall give his written permission with this condition.

8. Resolved, That the committee be allowed further time to report upon such other matters as have been referred to their consideration, and which are not embraced in this report.

Mr. FAULKNER. The committee, as the House will perceive, have reported only in part. They hastened this morning to prepare their report to the extent they have done, affecting the arrangement of the Hall, and the organization of the House, in order that, if it shall be approved by the House, the arrangements may all be made during the recess, and before the reassembling of Congress on the 4th of January next. Most of the matters embraced in the resolutions are as familiar to the members of the House as they are to the committee, and will require no explanation or remark.

The first portion of the resolution adopted by the House instructed us to inquire what additional messengers or other officers would be required for the preservation of the order of the House. The committee have given that subject a very careful examination and consideration.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will hear it.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire that the gentleman shall tell the House how many employes the Doorkeeper of the House now has by the authority of the House?

Mr. FAULKNER. The instructions under which we acted required us to ascertain what additional force is required. Under the old regulations there were nine messengers or doorkeepers. The committee unanimously arrived at the conclusion that, in consequence of the larger area of this Hall, its extended corridors and lobbies, and the general arrangement of the Hall and building, the Doorkeeper could not discharge his duties and preserve the order of this House unless an additional force of six doorkeepers or messengers was allowed him. That was the unanimous opinion of the committee, after a most careful examination of the whole subject. Upon that point there was no difference of opinion whatever.

The only departure which this report proposes to make from the arrangement of the Hall and galleries as they have heretofore been arranged in the old building, is the proposal to set apart a portion of the galleries for the accommodation of foreign ministers. It will be seen, sir, by reference to the historical notes which are appended to the rules of the House, that, from the earliest period of the Government, in the very first resolution introduced into this House upon the subject, foreign ministers were regarded as entitled to the privileges of the floor, and amidst all the mutations that have occurred in these rules, sometimes limiting and sometimes extending them, this privilege has uniformly been accorded to foreign ministers; not, sir, as any personal compliment to them, but as a just act of international courtesy; as a reciprocation by us of a courtesy which is uniformly extended by all the countries, in Europe and elsewhere, with which we have diplomatic relations, to our ministers abroad. Inasmuch, therefore, as we design to exclude foreign ministers from the privilege of the floor, which they have enjoyed for half a century, we have provided that a gallery shall be arranged for their use.

With reference to the rules of the House, upon the fullest reflection that the committee could give to the subject, they thought it was essentially necessary to curtail the privileges of the floor. It is obvious that there are no arrangements in this Hall, as there were in the old one, for the accommodation of the large number of persons who were admitted as privileged persons upon the floor. We have here galleries capable of accommodating fifteen hundred persons. In the old building the galleries were comparatively small, while the accommodations on the floor of the Hall were large. The committee, therefore, propose to limit the privileges of the floor to the persons mentioned.

With regard to that portion of the resolution in which we were instructed to inquire into the arrangements necessary for the comfort and health of the members, I will say that the Superintendent is now engaged in remedying the inconveniences which have been the subject of complaint. The arrangements are not completed; and it is for that reason, more than anything else, that we have requested a continuance of the power conferred on us by the House, in order that we may have all these arrangements completed to promote the comfort and health of the members of the body.

Mr. Speaker, I think there is nothing in the report to give rise to debate. It was agreed to unanimously on the part of the committee; and, therefore, I move the previous question.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia if his resolutions exclude from the floor the clerks of the various standing committees of the House?

Mr. FAULKNER. I will remark that the clerks of committees have never been allowed the privilege of this Hall under any rule ever adopted by the House.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to debate—the previous question having been called.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman from Virginia says that there are nine messengers of the House. There are forty-nine, and I want the House to understand it.

The question being on seconding the call for the previous question,

Mr. FLORENCE called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken by division; when there were—ayes 83, noes 49.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to lay the whole matter on the table.

Mr. CLEMENS. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FLORENCE called for tellers on the yeas and nays, but subsequently withdrew the call.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I move to postpone the whole subject indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, the previous question having been seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the report.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the vote be taken on the resolutions separately.

Mr. STANTON. I suppose that the report of the committee is an entire thing, not capable of division, and that there can be no division of it.

The SPEAKER. That has been the practice of the House uniformly—that after the previous question is seconded, and the main question ordered, there cannot be a division of the question.

Mr. BOWIE. If the proposition be susceptible of division by its sense there should be a division. These are distinct propositions. Some of them I am in favor of, and some of them I am opposed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit to the Chair whether a bill can be divided and voted on by sections, after the previous question is seconded?

The SPEAKER. The practice of the House, so far as the Chair can remember, has been uniform, that where a series of resolutions have been introduced, and the previous question seconded, and the main question ordered, there can be no division, but the vote must be taken on them as a whole. That has been the consistent practice of the House, without exception, so far as the Chair remembers. It might have been different if there had been a demand for a separate vote before the previous question was seconded.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, that we may change that.

Mr. LETCHER. Did not the gentleman vote in the negative?

The SPEAKER. There was no division.

Mr. BANKS. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I will withdraw my motion, and call the attention of the Chair to the 53d rule; and I think the Chair will reverse his decision, and hold, with me, that the proposition may be divided. It says:

“53. Any member may call for the division of a question, which shall be divided, if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that, one being taken away, a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House.—September 15, 1837. A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible—December 23, 1811; but a motion to strike out being lost, shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert.—March 13, 1832.”

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Georgia that, to reverse his decision upon his point of order, would be to reverse the uniform decisions of the House ever since the Chair has been a member of the House—for the last eight years.

Mr. SEWARD. I think the Chair is mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be very happy to have the gentleman refer him to a single instance where the practice has been different.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a question of order. I refer the Chair to the 136th rule, which says:

“No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor—November 13, 1794; nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present—March 13, 1832; nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present—April 26, 1828. The House may, at any time, by a vote of the majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and also for providing for the discharge of the Committee of the Whole House, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union—January 25, 1848—from the further consideration of any bill referred to it, after acting without debate on all amendments pending, and that may be offered.—March 11, 1844.”

I submit, therefore, that this resolution changing the rules of this House cannot be entertained without previous notice.

Mr. BANKS. The rules of the House have been referred to this committee.

The SPEAKER. Expressly referred and express authority given to the committee to report at any time. The Chair overrules the question of order.

Mr. SPINNER. I desire to know if it is too late to offer an amendment excluding the judges of the Supreme Court?

The SPEAKER. It is too late to move an amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. I thought the gentleman from Georgia offered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdrew it.

Mr. BURNETT. I wish to vote for a part of the report made by the committee, but not for the whole. I hope therefore the vote by which the main question was ordered will be reconsidered, and the report divided. I submit that motion.

Mr. BANKS. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, announcing that the President of the United States had informed the Senate that he had approved and signed an act to authorize the issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. SEWARD. I think we have done mischief enough. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the report of the committee.

Mr. BURNETT. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been refused.

Mr. FLORENCE. I think not. I demand tellers upon the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demanded tellers, but afterwards withdrew the demand.

Mr. FLORENCE. I did not understand the question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused. I believe it has been the practice of the House to entertain such a motion.

The SPEAKER. If the yeas and nays had been ordered, the probability is that the Chair would have ruled the gentleman's motion in order, but as they were refused, the Chair is disposed to overrule it.

Mr. FLORENCE. I think gentlemen cannot refuse to give us an opportunity to put ourselves upon the record.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman is upon the record now, and the trouble is saved.

Mr. DEWART. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the report—

Mr. FLORENCE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. FLORENCE and DEAN were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 52.

So the report was adopted.

Mr. FAULKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays upon the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The motion to reconsider was then laid on the table.

UTAH AFFAIRS.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of that part of the President's message which relates to the Territory of Utah, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KEITT. I desire to state to the House that I yesterday paired off with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] on the resolution to adjourn over. He would have voted against the resolution while I should have voted for it.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I objected to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the objection. The Chair begs leave to say to the gentleman from Illinois—as he said to a gentleman a day or two since—that when a gentleman desires to object to anything, if he will rise in his place and make the objection, there can be no misunderstanding. But, when gentlemen retain their seats, it is impossible for the Chair to determine whether objection is made or not. The Chair did not hear the objection of the gentleman from Illinois, and thinks it now comes too late.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I will state that I rose from my seat twice and made the objection.

Mr. GROW. Did the gentleman make it when he rose?

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I did.

The SPEAKER. Then the objection was in time.

DEATH OF HON. SAMUEL BRENTON.

Mr. PETTIT. It becomes my duty to bring to the notice of the House the death of the Hon. SAMUEL BRENTON, elected to it from the tenth congressional district of Indiana. This event occurred at his home, in Fort Wayne, in the midst of his family, on the evening of Sunday, March 29 last, the sequel of a fatal malady that became first manifest in the midst of the trying labors that closed the last Congress.

In the brief interval since that adjournment death has been busy in these chambers. Its tidings, always eloquent of instruction and admonition, now fall on us with uncommon frequency. But Indiana is twice a mourner. Besides the death of Mr. BRENTON, which I have just now communicated, the Hon. JAMES LOCKHART, elected to a seat here from the first congressional district of that State, is absent because he, too, has submitted to the same mighty summons. And in the same short season, another, the late Hon. George G. Dunn—if, in this apt connection, I may be pardoned this allusion—whose various talent, rare and copious eloquence, independence, and judgment, social virtues, nice sense of honor, inflexible integrity, and fiery scorn and indignation of everything wrong, are yet so well remembered here, has been lost from the roll of the living sons of that young commonwealth. The death of such men is much more than a private calamity.

Mr. BRENTON was born November 22, 1810, in Gallatin county, Kentucky. In 1830, at the age of twenty, he entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Henceforth, this was his calling—the chosen and darling calling and business of his life. In a country then new and but thinly peopled, it demanded much toil and sacrifice; but his zealous and active service in this ministry was only remitted at the end of a score of years, when a partial paralysis, in 1848, left him unequal to its tasks, and he then relinquished the office. During this period, he was successively stationed at Paoli, Crawfordville, Bloomington, Lafayette, and Fort Wayne. In 1849, the year following his disability, he was appointed register of the land office at Fort Wayne, and discharged its duties until the summer of 1851, when he was elected a member of the Thirty-Second Congress. Retiring from Congress at the end of his first term, he accepted the presidency of the Fort Wayne Female Seminary, which, under his superintendence, grew into quick and extraordinary prosperity. He was again elected to Congress in 1854, and again, last year, to the present Congress.

This quick recital of the principal facts of his history evince the public estimation and confidence in which he was universally held. But such public events fail to commemorate the better qualities of heart, which, with individual force, are impressed on those brought more immediately into contact. Mr. BRENTON was even more honored and loved, and will be best remembered in the social and private relations of life—in the varied character of counselor, neighbor, friend, husband, and father, where full scope was given for the play of the manly and gentle virtues of his heart.

The qualities of Mr. BRENTON were not brilliant. Such qualities are usually allied to an impetuosity and enthusiasm of character, at some expense of deliberation and judgment. But he had other qualities, which were more durable and useful. He was frank, sincere, genial, sagacious, sensible, practical. His friendship was unreserved, unstinted, steadfast. He was distinguished for a ready, abundant, vigorous sense, and was bold and enterprising in maintaining whatever he deemed right. Here he was firm; and between wrong and right nothing was ever yielded to calculations of expediency. He was vigorous and comprehensive in argument. His sincerity won confidence; and so much gained, his impressions, well told, were implanted and rooted in the hearts of those who heard him. Without being showy, all his qualities were sterling.

The profession to which his life had been dedicated, and to which his best years had been applied, made the religious element the dominant one in his character. A strong religious sentiment was natural to him, but he deemed piety valuable only as its maxims were practical, and not speculative. In such a school of religious belief, a good life was a primary and essential condition; and he lived, wherever he was known, as its faithful and illustrious example. Its influence was not capricious and occasional. Nor was it ever concealed. It was transparent at all times, everywhere. It was woven, as a part of the texture, into all his motives and conduct. He studied to measure his actions by its Divine authority, and seemed to "dwell ever in the great Task-master's eye." Such qualities of mind, earnest, sincere, sagacious, united to qualities of heart, charitable, gentle, and affectionate, all penetrated and mellowed by the influence of an unaffected piety, endeared him, wherever his acquaintance reached. Only the good we do survives the grave. The graces and virtues of the good man are remembered when his body "sleeps well" in this, its last appointment, and so, outliving him,

"Smell sweet and blossom in the dust."

What Mr. BRENTON was in performing the grave duties of this Hall, and the considerable influence exerted by him in the legislation at the Thirty-Second and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, is public history. I shall not allude to it further. Many of us are the witnesses of the accuracy of the lineaments I have attempted to portray, and, in the midst of such scenes as these we mingle in now, of his constancy to his post of duty. He suffered much from impaired health during the last days of the last Congress. But the importunity of friends could not persuade him from his place; and it was only at the final adjournment that he gladly turned away, like a soldier relieved from duty, to find solace, and, if Providence should allow it, rebuild his shattered health, among the friends whose confidence he represented, and in the bosom of his family. His longings for home were mixed with a prophetic sense that he should not long survive that meeting. His anxious wish to reach home was realized; but it was only to be stretched on a bed of fatal sickness, to be comforted, as his disease proceeded to its fatal termination, by the devoted love and ministrations of his family and friends. The melancholy event I have communicated followed soon after. There is a moral beauty and heroism in a good man's life, and such a life Mr. BRENTON crowned with the heroism and triumph of a Christian soldier's death.

It is profane to attempt to enter the sanctuary of recent domestic grief. Though we may feel this dispensation as a personal sorrow, and yield our sympathies to those who stand in nearer relations to the dead, and though time may heal the wounds of so severe affliction, the home made desolate by the death of the husband and father is without a human comforter. But the Providence that does all things right tempers the wind to the shorn lamb; we each, in time, shall take the same mysterious journey. Some go before, some follow after. And though prone to upbraid the particular providences by which death separates our friends from us, yet, in a larger economy, and seen with eyes of faith and hope, such events loosen our hold here; and those who go before us are the links of the chain that draws us on, and kindly unites us to the life to come.

The thickening news of death that comes home to us so presently, has its serious lessons for the living—of faithful duty to be done here, and the hope of happiness to crown it hereafter.

With reference to this event, I offer for adoption, the resolutions which I shall send to the Clerk's table. It is, I understand, the purpose of my colleague from the first district, intimately acquainted with the character and services of the late Judge LOCKHART, to call the attention of the House to his death. For this reason I shall not now move the usual resolution for an adjournment.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. SAMUEL BRENTON, elected to this body from the tenth congressional district of Indiana.

Resolved, That this House tenders its sympathy to the widow and family of the deceased in this bereavement, and that, as a testimonial of respect, its members and officers will go into mourning, and wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions be communicated to the widow of the deceased.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, before this resolution is adopted, I desire to add a few words to the just and eloquent tribute the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTIT] has paid to the memory of his late colleague, Mr. BRENTON.

He entered Congress as a Representative from the State of Indiana, seven years ago. During all the time he was a member of this House we were on terms of intimacy, and for the last two years, upon the same committee. And thus we became better acquainted than members from different and distant States usually are. He honored me with his confidence and regard. And I bade him farewell at the close of the last Congress as an esteemed and valued friend. To-day his death has been announced, and we are called upon to accord the last token of respect to his memory, required by usage, and which is due from the living to the dead.

Mr. BRENTON was modest and retiring, almost to a fault; unaffected and unpretending. It was only after becoming well acquainted with him that one could properly estimate his sound, good sense, or justly appreciate his unbending integrity. And amidst all the divisions of party, and differences of opinion, all who knew him, friends and opponents, knew that he ever acted in accordance with his honest convictions, with a frankness and directness worthy of the highest praise. It was this trait in his character that challenged universal regard, and entitled him to the respect of all—his evident sincerity and honesty of purpose. He had no enemies; but, as is ever the case with men of sterling qualities, those who knew him best esteemed him most.

Always acting upon his own convictions and judgment, he was yet charitable and courteous toward those with whom he differed. The bitterness of party strife never soured his temper or overcame the kindness of his nature. He passed that ordeal unharmed. Few of those possessed of more varied acquirements, or even higher abilities, had a sounder judgment or greater decision of character; and none could be more upright in the discharge of all his duties. Strictly moral and exemplary in his conduct, he was emphatically an honest man—true to his principles, faithful to his friends, and just to all; and his highest eulogy is contained in that brief and simple statement. No words of mine can lessen the grief his family and relatives must feel for their great loss. But it may be some consolation for them to know, hereafter, how truly he was respected, and how sincerely regretted, by those who knew him here. That will appear by the proceedings of to-day. It is all that we can offer.

It is remarkable that during the short period since the adjournment of the last Congress, four members of the Senate of the United States, [ADAMS of Mississippi, BELL of New Hampshire, BUTLER of South Carolina, and RUSK of Texas,] and three members of the present House of Representatives [BRENTON and LOCKHART of Indiana, and MONTGOMERY of Pennsylvania,] have been numbered with the dead. They have passed onward before us to that dread hereafter, towards which all human footsteps tend, to that dim eternity to which, in a few years, we must all be consigned; where all is cold and silent, and from which no voice comes back to the living. What a startling commentary upon the uncertainty of human life, and the vanity of all human greatness! All our great projects, our ambitious aims, our fierce rivalries, our high designs, cannot stay the angel of death for a single moment. Perhaps never before, in so short a space, were so many members of the same Congress stricken down. May these repeated admonitions, as day after day, the death of another member is announced, be heard and heeded, and may the living pause and remember how soon they, too, must pass away forever; how soon they, too, must die and be buried, and become like those we mourn.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DOWDELL. I rise to a personal explanation. My attention has been called this morning to a copy of the Globe, wherein I am made to appear as having voted for both Mr. Allen and his opponent, Mr. Brown, for Clerk. I apprehend that it is an error of the printer; and I call the attention of the House to it from the fact that my notice was called to it at so late a day that I have not been able to correct it in the Congressional Globe, and the error will therefore go into the pages of the Congressional Globe. I learn that the Journal of the House is correct in that respect. I voted only for Mr. Allen, not for both.

UTAH AFFAIRS—AGAIN.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I desire to withdraw the objection that I made to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] to refer to the Committee on Territories so much of the President's message as relates to Utah, so that the committee may have an opportunity of acting on it during the holidays.

There being no objection, Mr. BANKS's motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF HON. JAMES LOCKHART.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of making an announcement similar to the one you have just heard—to announce the death of the Hon. JAMES LOCKHART, also a member elect to the present Congress from the State of Indiana. He died at his residence in the city of Evansville, in that State, on the 7th day of September last, after a severe and protracted illness.

It will thus be seen that the hand of affliction has fallen heavily upon Indiana; that of the eleven members elected to the present Congress from that State, in October, 1856, two have already gone to the tomb.

Judge LOCKHART was born at the village of Auburn, in the State of New York, on the 13th day of February, 1806. In the fall of 1832 he emigrated to the State of Indiana, and located in the then village, but now city, of Evansville, in which he continued to reside until the time of his death. Not long after his location in Indiana, he commenced the practice of the law as a profession, in which he continued, except at brief intervals, up to the time of his death.

In the winter of 1841-42 he was elected by the Legislature of his State prosecuting attorney of his judicial circuit. Two years afterwards he was reelected for another term. In the winter of 1845-46, after the close of his second term as prosecuting attorney, he was elected presiding judge of the same judicial circuit. In the summer of 1850, while still in commission as judge of his circuit, he was elected a member of the constitutional convention which assembled in that year to revise and amend the constitution of his State. Of that talented and influential body of men he was one of the most active and efficient members.

In August, 1851, he was elected a member of the Thirty-Second Congress, and in the month following he resigned the office of circuit judge to enable him to take his seat in that body. He served as a member of that Congress for the full term. In the spring of 1853, after the expiration of that Congress, he resumed the practice of his profession.

In the fall of 1856, after one of the bitterest contests ever known within our State, he was elected a member of the present Congress by a largely increased and overwhelming majority.

At the time of his last election he was in feeble and failing health. It was obvious that, without a speedy restoration, his span of life was short. Notwithstanding the feeble condition of his health, he continued in the active discharge of the duties of his profession, and of those public duties which his position devolved upon him, until utter prostration bid him cease. Never was that iron will and indomitable energy, which so much distinguished him through life, so clearly manifest as during the last trying months of his most distressing illness. He died as the strong man dieth; he literally fell with the harness upon him. In matters political, Judge LOCKHART was devotedly attached to the organization and the creed of the party with which he affiliated. As a political leader, he was bold and indefatigable. During the last fifteen years of his life I enjoyed much of his personal friendship and confidence. But few persons, outside of his immediate family friends, knew him more intimately than I have known him. Having been elected to fill the place made vacant by his death, and occupying his seat in this House to-day, it affords me pleasure to bear willing testimony to his energy, ability, and integrity as a public officer, and to the fidelity with which he discharged the many important trusts confided to him as a public man.

Here, as in the ranks of the Army, when one falls another takes his place, and everything moves on as before; but not so in the private relations of life. When a near and tried friend is stricken down, there is no one to take his place. When the protecting arm of a husband is withered into dust, there is no adequate earthly consolation.

I submit the following resolutions for adoption:

Resolved, That the members of this House have heard with deep regret the announcement of the death of the Hon. JAMES LOCKHART, a member elect from the first congressional district of the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That in token of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members and officers of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House forward a copy of these resolutions to the widow of the deceased.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to second the resolutions just offered by my colleague, [Mr. NIBLACK.] I do not propose on this occasion to pronounce a lengthened eulogy on the life, character, and public services of the deceased. Were I disposed to do so, I would fail, I am sure, to improve on what has already been so well and so impressively said by my colleague; but, being the only member of this House from the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, who served with the deceased during the Thirty-Third Congress, I cannot find it in my heart to remain silent, or to refuse, on this solemn occasion, to give utterance to a few words of sincere respect for the memory of the deceased, and of condolence with his sorrow-stricken family in their bereavement.

That I have known Judge LOCKHART long and intimately, will remain among my most cherished remembrances. I knew him in the walks of private life and in the social circle, where he was respected by all who had the pleasure of his society. I knew him as the efficient prosecuting attorney of his judicial circuit. I knew him as the able, upright, and impartial judge. I knew him as the representative of the people of the first congressional district of his adopted State, on the floor of this House; in all of which positions he discharged his duties with ability and fidelity; with entire satisfaction to his constituents and to the country.

Judge LOCKHART, though naturally retiring and unobtrusive, was no ordinary man. He was a sound jurist and a sagacious politician, possessing a clear, logical, and discriminating mind. He was kind and benevolent to a fault; ardent in his friendship; firm and decided in his opinions, yet charitable towards those with whom he differed. Although always a firm and decided Democrat, often participating in the exciting and angry political contests through which the country has been passing for the last twenty years, his high bearing and manly deportment gained, as their meed, the applause and admiration of his political adversaries.

I saw Judge LOCKHART in this city in March last, which was the last occasion of our meeting. The disease which finally proved fatal, was then progressing, and rapidly approaching the citadel of life. His physical powers were fast declining; but, though feeble, his spirit was buoyant with the hope that he would ultimately recover. He spoke feelingly of our long acquaintance and former service here together, of many pleasant anticipations for our mutual interests during the approaching session; but, alas! these fond hopes have been blighted, and he is gone from among us forever.

Mr. Speaker, why should I say more? Judge LOCKHART is dead! How fresh in my remembrance is the occasion of the sad announcement! what a thrill of sorrow it brought with it, as it first fell upon my ear! How the memories of the past clustered thick and fast around me, and how instinctively, how deeply my mind yielded to the impress of the truth of the uncertainty of human life, and the utter futility of human fame and ambition! Sir, before we shall have discharged our duties, and finished our labors here, the shaft of Death may make vacant the chairs which you and I occupy, and the ever-startling announcement again and again be flashed on the wings of lightning to the remotest portions of the Republic. I say, such, sir, may be among the inscrutable decrees of Providence; then, we should let this sad announcement of to-day affect our inner hearts, and admonish us that the inexorable hour awaits us all. Let it impress upon us all the necessity for the exercise of a spirit of kindness and forbearance for and toward each other, and let it soften the asperities which too often appear in our unguarded moments in the heat and excitement of debate.

In conclusion, sir, from a sincere heart I invoke the blessings of Heaven upon the bereaved widow, and pray that the wind may be tempered to the shorn lamb.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. PETTIT. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, As a further mark of respect to the Hon. SAMUEL BRENTON, elected to this Congress from the tenth congressional district of Indiana; and to the memory of the Hon. JAMES LOCKHART, elected to this Congress from the first congressional district of the same State, whose death has now been announced to this House, that this body do now adjourn.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented a petition of the judge and other officers of the district court of the United States, for the western district of Arkansas, praying for the erection of a jail at Van Buren, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have been requested to present a petition from inhabitants of the town of Belvidere, Illinois, asking the Senate to bring forward some measure for the peaceful extinction of slavery by a fair compensation out of the national Treasury to the slaveholding States for the manumission of their slaves, whenever they shall be disposed to perform that act. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EVANS. It is proper that petitions on the same subject should take the same course. A petition similar to this was presented the other day by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. Foster,] and it was ordered to lie on the table. I move that the same course be pursued with regard to this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to its taking the same course.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a memorial of John R. Temple, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 38) for the relief of John R. Temple, of Louisiana. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry Volcker, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, to confirm the title of Henry Volcker to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

The report was accompanied by an estimate of the Superintendent of Public Printing, stating that the cost of the proposed number of the message and accompanying documents would be $47,194, and of the Treasury report, $8,704, including the cost of paper and binding.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. STUART submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Mr. MALLORY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the establishment of a court-house at Apalachicola; also a bill to repeal certain laws relative to pilots.

Mr. POLK gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill to settle doubts in relation to the title of certain common field lots in the State of Missouri, heretofore granted to the inhabitants of St. Louis for the support of schools.

A bill for the relief of Marie Lisa, and Joachim Lisa and others; and to provide for the location of certain confirmed private land claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JONES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce the following bills; which were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (S. No. 33) to authorize the State of Iowa to apply the unsold lands heretofore granted for the improvement of the navigation of the Des Moines river, to the construction of a railroad in the valley of said river.

A bill (S. No. 34) explanatory of an act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi and other States," approved the 3d of March, 1857.

Mr. HOUSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 35) for the relief of Michael Kiunev, late a private in company I., eighth infantry, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 36) further to amend an act "to divide the State of Illinois into two judicial districts," approved February 13, 1855; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 3) to extend and define the authority of the President, under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" in respect to dropped and retired naval officers; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAVIS. The subject has been so fully discussed in the Senate that I hardly suppose it will be required that the joint resolution should be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. If, however, the chairman desires it—

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly; I ask for that reference.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course, then, I cannot object to the reference.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GWIN. I move that it be printed. The subject is one on which we ought to act immediately.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

Mr. PUGH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 37) to provide for the admission of Kansas into the Union; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PUGH. With the indulgence of the Senate I wish to give a brief explanation of the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suggest that it ought to be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. PUGH. I have no objection to its reference, but I wished to have a printed copy of the bill, with the view that probably other Senators might suggest amendments before sending it to the committee; but I have no objection to its being referred to the Committee on Territories at once.

I was about to state, as it would delay the Senate some time to read the bill, and as it is an act of some importance to myself, the substance of this bill which I offer as a compromise for the settlement of the present difficulties in Kansas.

The bill provides for the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, under the constitution adopted at Lecompton, November 7, 1857, with the boundaries defined in the pacification bill of the last Congress, and upon two fundamental conditions.

The first condition is that the seventh article of the constitution, relative to slavery, shall be submitted to a separate and direct vote, "Yes" or "No," of the qualified electors, on the 7th of April, 1858, at which time the State officers, the Legislature, and the Congressmen shall be chosen. The returns of this election to be made to the Governor of the Territory instead of the president of the convention, and the election conducted in obedience to the laws in force on the 7th of November.

The second fundamental condition is that the constitution shall not be so construed as to limit or impair the right of the people, through their Legislature, at any time, to call a convention for the purpose of altering, amending, or abolishing their form of government, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

The President is required to admit the State by proclamation as soon as the election of April 7th shall have transpired.

The ordinance of the Lecompton convention, relative to the grants of public lands, is rejected, and, in its stead, the usual articles of compact are offered to the first Legislature of Kansas, for acceptance or rejection, as in the case of other new States.

I shall not ask the attention of the Senate to any further exposition of the bill at this time; but I hope that after the Senator from Mississippi has spoken on the subject, I may be allowed to explain somewhat more fully the reasons on which I base these various provisions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Territories.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, to reconsider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SLIDELL on the 22d December last:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate the records of proceedings of the several naval courts of inquiry, organized under the act of Congress approved January 16, 1857, to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy."

Mr. SLIDELL. I understood that the Senator from Kentucky (whose attention I beg leave to call to this matter) desired that this resolution should not be acted upon until the courts had finally adjourned, and closed their proceedings. I have no disposition to press it now, unless it be agreeable to the Senator from Kentucky to pass the resolution at this time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I think, perhaps, it had better lie over, but I am willing to consult the wishes of Senators. If the Senator from Louisiana prefers to have it acted on now, very well.

Mr. SLIDELL. I suggest that it will be very easy to make a supplemental motion, if all the documents should not come in. Anticipating an objection that probably will be made, and I think has already been made, as to the great expense which would necessarily attend the printing of these documents, I will say that the natural course would be a reference of them to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate; the printing of such documents only as may become matters of discussion, will probably be asked for hereafter. I cannot see any objection to the adoption of the resolution at present.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The gentleman's aim,

I presume, is to extend the call as well to cases hereafter to be decided as to those already decided.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have no objection to that modification of the resolution.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not know that I have any objection to that. If the Senator desires to give that form to his resolution, very well. I presume the gentleman intends that we shall have the original records.

Mr. SLIDELL. That is my intention.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. To make copies would be laborious.

Mr. SLIDELL. I understand so.

Mr. BELL. To have the originals would be contrary to our usage.

Mr. SLIDELL. On reading this resolution, I will state that it appears to me it will cover the whole ground up to the time the President makes his communication, and then the courts will have finished their business and adjourned.

Mr. BELL. I would suggest to my colleague on the committee that unless he has examined the subject, and finds that these records are less voluminous than I apprehend they are, we shall have to make some room for their admission here. But I do not see what we can do with them when they do come. If all the records that have been accumulated in these inquiries are to be transmitted, and I presume they include all the previous examinations and decisions of courts of inquiry and courts-martial in reference to the character of these individuals, they will be exceedingly voluminous and ponderous. I take it that, according to no custom or usage that I know of, can we expect that they will transmit the original records here, to be in our custody. I presume they will have to employ an extra clerical force to furnish us copies of them all. I had supposed that in any case which may become the subject of inquiry before the Committee on Naval Affairs, it would be competent for the committee to request a copy of the record of the proceedings of the courts in that particular case. Perhaps they might give us the original papers, if it became necessary to see them. So if any case became the subject of investigation in the Senate, it would be competent for the Senate to call for the record in that case; but I think it would lead to great inconvenience to the Department, unless, as I stated before, they employ extra clerical force to furnish us with copies of the whole proceedings. I merely make this suggestion.

Mr. SLIDELL. As to the first difficulty suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, my colleague on the Committee on Naval Affairs, that there will not be room in this wing of the Capitol to receive the papers; that, perhaps, may be left to the discretion of the Secretary and the Sergeant-at-Arms. I presume some arrangement can be made. I have no idea that the Secretary of the Navy will think it necessary to have these papers copied. I think he may venture to trust these records to the safe-keeping of the Senate during a reasonable time.

As I before said, so far as I am concerned, I do not anticipate that I shall ask for the printing of these records except in some very few cases indeed; but I should like to have an opportunity of examining them, and I do not know of any other means of doing it, except by going to the Navy Department at hours that would not be convenient to myself or the Department. When they are before our committee, some examination may be made of them; and those cases selected, the records in relation to which it may be necessary to print. I really do not see all the objections which present themselves to the fertile imagination of my colleague on the Committee on Naval Affairs. I hope the resolution will be allowed to pass.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am entirely content that the Senator from Louisiana shall take his own course in relation to this subject; but I wish to make one suggestion, or rather to repeat the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee, if it would not be better to call for such records as any Senator may desire to have before the Senate from time to time. In this resolution we call for all these records, and many of them may be entirely useless. They may be cases in which the party is content with the decision that has been made. We do not want those records here, certainly. They would be but an incumbrance.

But where it is supposed that justice requires any revision of the decision, it may be proper for us to call for the records of trial then; and that would limit the call, perhaps, to comparatively few of the records, for all I know, or it may be a greater number; at any rate it would not incurr us with those that nobody wants. With this suggestion, I am ready to acquiesce in any course that is desired. I think the resolution ought to be express, that we desire the original records, and that they shall be returned by us when we have ceased to use them; for they are necessary records of the Department, and I suppose it may be inferred that that would be the course.

There is one other remark I wish to make, and that is, whether it is supposed the calling for these papers is to have the effect of delaying our action in those cases which have been favorably decided on and in obedience to which the President has made his nominations to the Senate. I hope no such delay as that is contemplated, and shall resist any such use being made of this call for records. I think they are entitled, by law, to a confirmation at the hands of the Senate. All we have to do is to inquire, as we do generally, as to the fitness of these parties. With these remarks, I am content that the Senator shall take the course which he pleases in regard to this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. SLIDELL. I think we can dispose of this matter in a few minutes, if the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] will allow us to go on.

Mr. BROWN. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to postpone the special order so as to continue the consideration of this subject. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I shall be compelled to oppose this proposition, until we shall have had some investigation as to the probable cost of printing these records. I have no remarks to make on the propriety of this call in itself, but I believe the resolution has not been referred to any committee.

Mr. SLIDELL. It is not in contemplation to call for the printing of these documents. This is a preliminary step.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am aware that the Senator from Louisiana does not intend to have them printed, but when these documents shall be presented here for purposes of examination, the printing will be ordered on the request of any two or three gentlemen. The practice of the Senate assures me of this. Though the Senator from Louisiana will not ask for this printing, others may; and the consequences will be that the printing of the usual number—fourteen hundred and twenty copies—will be ordered, and then you might as well print five thousand, for it costs very little more to print five thousand than fourteen hundred and twenty. I believe some investigation ought to be had so that we may know the cost of this printing. As to the propriety of calling for these documents, I believe it to be exceedingly questionable. It will lead to the publication of many things that ought never to go to the world. It will cause unpleasantness to many parties, and will be productive of nothing but confusion and bitterness. I hope that at least the matter will be referred to a committee, and a report made before the Senate adopts the resolution.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am sure that if the chairman of the Committee on Printing makes any objection to a motion of any Senator on the ground of the absence of any necessity for printing these records, or because of the cost, he would be listened to with that attention which the Senate is always accustomed to pay to him. I do not anticipate that trouble.

A remark fell from the Senator from Kentucky to the effect that perhaps this movement was intended for purposes of delay. I hope he does not include me in that imputation. I entertain an earnest desire to have this very disagreeable matter settled. I think the sooner we pass this resolution, and obtain possession of the information we desire to govern us in our action, the sooner we shall arrive at a consummation of this business. For myself, I disavow altogether any intention to delay the settlement of this question, either here or elsewhere. I have nothing more to say than that I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. DAVIS. I should think it very unfortunate, indeed, to draw the original records out of the Department at this time. I hope there are cases which, under the revision of the President, may call for his action by nomination to the Senate, where the courts have not recommended such nomination. If it be desirable that the Senate should have the proceedings of the courts in all these cases, I think they must be copied, and the originals left in the Department for the revision of the President, and his action upon them. I do not perceive why the Senate should call for the records, unless it is for the exact purpose of printing them. If the Committee on Naval Affairs require information, such as is to be gathered from the record, in each case where they need that aid, it is in their power to call for the original papers. In all other cases where the records are not needed for the use of the committee, I think it far better that they should remain in the Department. I am not answered by saying that the records need only be sent to accompany nominations which may be made, because the President may wish to make a comparison between a case which he has submitted on a recommendation of the court to the Senate and some other case which has not been submitted, because not recommended by the court. For these reasons, I think, to enable the President to discharge his duty properly, the originals should remain in his possession.

Mr. SLIDELL. A suggestion has just been made to me which, perhaps, may obviate all the difficulty in this case. I understand from one of my colleagues on the Committee on Naval Affairs, that an abstract of the record and testimony in all these cases has been made very carefully by the Department. For all preliminary purposes, that will be quite sufficient for me, and, with the assent of the Senate, I propose to amend the resolution so as to make it read:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate an abstract of the records of proceedings of the several naval courts of inquiry, organized under the act of Congress approved January 16, 1857, to amend an act entitled, "An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy."

Mr. BAYARD. As I can see, in my own judgment, much evil that may flow from the adoption of this resolution without any possible good on the action of the Senate, I shall be necessarily compelled to vote against it. I do not see how we are to constitute ourselves, in open session, a tribunal for the purpose of revising the action of these courts of inquiry. I think the whole proceeding, from the enactment of the original law down to the present time, has done nothing but demoralize the Navy. If this testimony be submitted to the Senate, in open session, either in full or in abstract, I think the necessary result will be its publication. It will only lead to disputes, to crimination and recrimination, among officers of the Navy; it will increase heartburnings and jealousies, and will tend to demoralize the Navy far more than it is now. I am unable to perceive any possible ground or reason on which we ought to call for this testimony for any beneficial purpose. If a nomination should come before the Senate in executive session, I can conceive that a Senator might desire that the record in that particular case should be submitted to the Senate, though I should doubt the policy of the measure even then; but, certainly, I can see no propriety in a general publication of what is called an abstract of this testimony. If it is to be truthful, and give proper information, it must be an entire abstract; it must omit nothing material. Here you are delegating to others the power of saying what is and what is not relevant testimony, in each of these cases. I think it wiser that the matter should be suffered to sleep in the Departments, reserving the right to any Senator, in any individual case where he thinks it necessary for purposes of individual justice, to call, in executive session, for the proceedings in that case. I am opposed to the resolution as it stands.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have never entered into the subject of this naval investigation, nor have I made any remarks in the Senate with regard to it. Very much time was occupied during the last Congress in endeavoring to put an end to the difficulties that had grown out of the execution of a law of a previous session, and after a great deal of time and labor and attention to the subject, a plan was devised which it was supposed would put an end to them. Other boards were provided, and modes of carrying the question for revision before those boards pointed out. They were to report to the President, and he was to examine the cases, and nominate to the Senate such officers as he thought proper for reappointment. It was hoped, at least, that this would put an end to any more investigations of particular cases here, in the Senate, unless, indeed, in a particular case of a nomination—like any other nomination to office—a Senator objecting to it would be at liberty, in executive session, to call for any information the Department might have; but that should be in executive session, and be confined to the particular case in hand. I presume we are not here to take upon ourselves a revision of the decisions of the courts of inquiry, and of the decisions of the President in all these cases, and make provision for that by a call of this kind. It strikes me as exceedingly ill advised. Gentlemen may differ in opinion from me on this point; but, to my mind, the movement is entirely out of place, entirely out of time, and altogether inconsistent with the views entertained by this body at the last session. We can never put an end to these proceedings if we now lay the foundation for a reexamination of the whole matter. I am opposed to any call of this kind, and to any publication of the sort now indicated.

Mr. STUART. I think it is due to the Senator from Mississippi that he should proceed with his remarks to-day; and I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. DOUGLAS, to refer so much of the President's message as relates to the Territory of Kansas to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have sought an opportunity to address the Senate on this subject now, because I think the season more auspicious for a calm and unimpassioned consideration of it than any we shall have for weeks, or perhaps for months, to come. Not feeling disposed to take part in any scene of undue excitement which may be produced by the discussion of this question, I have preferred to deliver my views in reference to it at a time when the Senate and, to some extent, the whole country, is sufficiently calm to give to them whatever consideration may be justly theirs. To understand the subject fully, it seems to me proper that we should go back to the beginning and examine the starting point.

When, in 1854, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] brought forward his bill to organize the Territory of Kansas, he incorporated into it this language:

"The said Territory, when admitted as a State, shall be received into the Union with or without slavery, as its constitution may prescribe at the time of its admission."

Whoever voted for that bill, voted to indorse this sentiment. The friends of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, in both Houses of Congress, stand to-day upon the record solemnly pledged to admit the State with or without slavery, as its constitution may prescribe at the time of admission, and the friends of the measure throughout the country stand similarly committed. At a later period, the national Democratic party assembled in convention at Cincinnati, and in laying down a platform of principles they resolved—

"That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

After the adoption of that resolution, the convention of national Democrats nominated the present Chief Magistrate of the nation, and you, sir, for the first and second offices in the gift of the Republic. You were elected. By this proceeding, the members of that convention, its nominees for President and Vice President, and the electors, so far as the national Democratic party were concerned, stood solemnly pledged to the admission of Kansas into the Union with or without slavery, as her constitution should determine. As an humble member of the party, supposing that all these proceedings were sincere—that they were to be carried out in good faith—I, so early as the 22d of December, 1856, addressing the Senate on one branch of this subject, employed this language:

"If Kansas comes here with a constitution made by her bona fide people, free from all outside influences, excluding slavery, there is not a Democrat in either House of Congress who will not vote for her admission; and if, on the other hand, she comes with a constitution, similarly made, tolerating slavery, there is not a Democrat who will not vote for her admission."

I supposed, sir, that the passage of the original Kansas bill, the adoption of the resolution which I have read by the national Democratic party, the nomination of gentlemen committed to the support of the doctrines contained in the resolution, and their subsequent triumphant election through the agency of the national Democratic party, had committed all of us to the doctrine that Kansas was to be admitted with or without slavery, as her people should determine. Some question having been raised as to whether we meant that precisely, or, if we did, as to whether we were not disposed to avoid the force of the commitment by a resort to technicalities, I, on the 23d of December last, just before the last adjournment of the Senate, this question being under consideration, used this language:

"I desire simply to say that I stand where I stood at the last session of Congress, and that nothing which transpired in Kansas on Monday last is to change my position. If the election on Monday was a fair one, as I hope it was, in which all parties were allowed freely and without hindrance to take part, and Kansas asks admission as a free State, I stand upon the record in favor of her admission. If, on the other hand, she asks admission as a slave State, I shall expect those who entered into the compact with us during the last session of Congress to abide by their pledges and vote for her admission."

Kansas has voted. If telegraphic and other rumors from that country may be relied upon, she is likely to ask for admission as a slave State. The question now arises, are these pledges to be redeemed; and, if not, why? Is the compact into which we entered to be kept in good faith; and, if not, why? Is Kansas, upon her own demand, to be admitted as a slave State; and, if not, why? I mean to address myself to these inquiries. I have shown you, sir, that the friends of the Kansas bill stood committed to the admission of Kansas as a slave State, if she should ask to be thus admitted. I have shown you, sir, that the national Democratic party in convention, and by its vote at the ballot-box, stands solemnly committed to the same doctrine. I have shown you at the same time that I, and those who think with me, who prefer the admission of Kansas as a slave State, stood solemnly committed to her admission as a free State, if she came and asked for admission as a free State. We never dreamed of avoiding the force of this commitment by a resort to miserable technicalities. It was a pledge made in good faith; and, whenever the opportunity has offered, we have renewed the pledge to stand by it in good faith. As I said in the few remarks made by me on the 23d of December last—thus standing pledged ourselves, we expect those who stand pledged on the other side to act in equal faith to their obligation.

Beyond all question, Mr. President, slavery lies at the bottom of our difficulties in Kansas. We may differ in reference to her banking policy, her railroad policy, her school policy, her laws regulating marriage and divorce, the relation between master and servant, and parent and child, and all that. That we may differ on these points is certainly most true; but it is just as true, that if slavery were out of the way, we should not waste one hour of our precious time in considering one or all of these points combined.

Nor, sir, is this difference on the subject of slavery of recent origin. It dates back almost to the foundation of the Government; but it was not until 1819 or 1820 that it became so intense as to threaten not only the peace but the very perpetuity of the Government. Though the men of that day entered into a sort of compromise which was kept, as such compromises are apt to be, with Punic faith, the feeling has become still more intense with each succeeding year from that day until now; each attempt to compromise it has but resulted in still further disaster to the country. Perhaps in all the conflicts and all the contests which we have had in reference to slavery, nothing is more worthy of note than this: that whenever a Territory has been about to be organized over that portion of our domain where slavery had neither gone nor was likely to go, Congress has acted without difficulty. Whenever a new State has been introduced into the sisterhood from that region of country where slavery does not exist, we have found the same state of feeling; she has been introduced as a matter of course. On the other hand, whenever you have been about to organize a Territory in that portion of the public domain into which slavery had either penetrated or was likely to penetrate, there has been a revival of this sectional controversy. Whenever a State has been introduced from that portion of the country, you have had a still more intensified state of feeling on this subject.

Thus, sir, you have seen States in the Northwest introduced one after another. Michigan, the State from which my honorable friend before me [Mr. STUART] comes, Iowa, and Wisconsin present notable examples—organized, sustained, and admitted into the Union, with scarcely a word of controversy from the South. When you go South, you find that the introduction of Arkansas and Florida and Texas, was stoutly resisted, and chiefly on the ground of slavery. These things have brought my mind to the conclusion, as they have doubtless brought the minds of other gentlemen, that slavery is regarded, as I stated at the outset, as the great bone of contention between the two sections of the Union.

Mr. President, I find that I am, as I am sometimes apt to be in moments of excitement, taken suddenly with vertigo. I yield the floor.

Mr. CLAY. I move the postponement of this question until Wednesday.

Mr. DAVIS. When will my colleague be able to go on?

Mr. BROWN. To-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator from Alabama will modify his motion so as to postpone the question until to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY. I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDER J. ATOTCHA.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced that the first business in order was the bill (S. No. 28) for the relief of Alexander J. Atocha, which was read the second time.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to examine into the claims of Alexander J. Atocha against the Government of Mexico, for losses sustained by him by reason of his expulsion from that Republic in 1845, and to pay the loss or damage so ascertained. It is provided, however, that the amount so to be paid shall in no event exceed the balance of the $3,250,000 provided by the fifteenth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Mexico, which still remains unapplied to that object.

Mr. STUART. From what committee does that bill come?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. STUART. I should like to hear the report, so as to see what the facts are.

Mr. SEWARD. The report in this case was made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. MASON,] and is based on the agreement of the committee to a report made by him at the last session. I apprehend that no member of the committee who is now present is prepared to explain the matter to the Senate or take charge of the bill. With the consent of one of my colleagues on the committee, who takes an interest in the subject, I move that the consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE P. MARSH.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, next proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) for the relief of George P. Marsh, which contains a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of Mr. Marsh, late Minister Resident of the United States to the Ottoman Porte, for additional compensation and expenses incurred by him in the performance of special services not pertaining to his mission, and at a point different from that to which he was accredited, in compliance with instructions from the Department of State, and for judicial services rendered by him under the act of August 11, 1848, entitled "An act to carry into effect certain provisions in the treaties between the United States and China and the Ottoman Porte, giving certain judicial powers to the ministers and consuls of the United States in those countries." In settling these accounts, the sum of $9,000 is to be allowed as compensation for special services in the mission to Greece, and in ascertaining the amount of these expenses the certificate of the party is to be regarded as sufficient, where no regular voucher can be produced; and a further allowance, at the rate of $1,000 per annum, is to be made to Mr. Marsh for his judicial services during the period of his mission to the Ottoman Porte.

On the 29th of May, 1849, Mr. Marsh was appointed Minister Resident to the Ottoman Porte, and having entered upon the duties of his mission, continued in charge of it until the 19th day of December, 1853, when he had his final audience of leave. By an act of Congress, approved on the 11th of August, 1848, certain judicial duties were imposed on the Commissioner of the United States to China, the Minister Resident of the United States to the Ottoman Porte, and the American consuls in both those countries; and by the eighteenth section of the act it was provided that a compensation of $1,000 per annum, in addition to his salary, should be paid to the commissioner, in consideration of the duties imposed upon him by the act. Mr. Marsh's predecessor, Hon. Dabney S. Carr, claimed the payment of this sum in addition to his salary, but the Treasury Department refused to allow it, on the ground, that though judicial duties were imposed by the act upon both the Commissioner to China and the Minister to Turkey, yet the compensation was intended to be given to the commissioner alone. Upon his return to the United States, Mr. Carr presented his memorial to Congress praying for the payment of various sums of money claimed by him and disallowed by the accounting officers; and, at the first session of the Thirty-Second Congress, by an amendment to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, $1,000 per year, in addition to the salary, together with other moneys, was allowed to Mr. Carr for the performance of the judicial services from the date of the passage of the act to his final departure from Constantinople. It is conceived that this allowance by Congress is a legislative construction of the true intent and meaning of the act of 1848.

By special instructions, under date of April 29, 1852, the Department of State ordered Mr. Marsh to proceed to Athens, in Greece, on board a vessel of the Mediterranean squadron, to investigate certain complaints preferred by Dr. Jonas King, an American citizen, resident in Greece, against the Government and the judicial tribunals of that country, report thereon, and, "after transmitting his report, to remain at Athens, or in its neighborhood, till he heard from the Department." In pursuance of these instructions, he embarked for Athens, as soon as a ship was ready to receive him, and arrived at that city on the 31st day of July, 1852. He immediately engaged in the intricate and laborious investigations committed to him; and having completed his reports in the month of October following, he transmitted them to the State Department; and, in compliance with his instructions, awaited the further orders of the Department.

Upon the 5th of February, 1853, the President of the United States, through the State Department, instructed him to enter into communication with the Government of Greece, and endeavor to obtain redress for the wrongs which Dr. King had suffered at the hands of that Government and its judicial tribunals. He accordingly commenced a negotiation with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and remained at Athens in the prosecution of the same until the 25th of June, 1853, when the alarming posture of affairs at Constantinople, in his judgment, required his immediate return thither, and he accordingly proceeded to that city; but the correspondence with the Greek minister was continued until his recall.

By the original instructions of the State Department, he was directed to "keep an account of his traveling expenses whilst engaged in carrying out the instructions," and he accordingly presented an account, covering only some trifling disbursements for stationery, copying, &c., and his bare personal expenses, which has been allowed and paid. By the performance of the duties of the special mission intrusted to him, his household expenses were much augmented, and the loss of rent, (his house having remained unoccupied during his absence,) the sacrifice on the sale of horses and stores upon his departure, the expenses of protecting his house and other property, and other contingencies, amounted to more than the entire sum received by him for personal expenses; and he is consequently a loser to a considerable amount by the performance of the arduous duties imposed upon him.

In view of the extra trouble and expense attendant upon the special mission to Greece, the committee are of opinion that Mr. Marsh should be allowed the sum of $9,000 for extra compensation, together with the expenses incurred by him on account of his mission, the amount of which to be ascertained, in the absence of regular vouchers, by the certificate of the party. Compensation for judicial services having been allowed to his predecessor, by the act of August 31, 1852, making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, the committee can perceive no just reason why a similar allowance should not be made to Mr. Marsh during his continuance in the same mission.

Mr. FOOT. I will simply say that this bill is precisely in the form in which it has passed the Senate during the last four years. It was reported before by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. MASON,] and failed of action in the House of Representatives. It was not reached there at the last session.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no further business before the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 4, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. G. BUTLER.

The Journal of December 23d last was read and approved.

QUALIFICATION OF A MEMBER.

The Hon. JOHN F. FARNSWORTH, a member from the State of Illinois, appeared in his place, and was qualified by taking the usual oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communications:

A communication from the Secretary of State, in relation to the claim of Michael Pappenitza, an Austrian subject, for losses alleged to have been sustained by him during the popular out-break at New Orleans in 1851, and inclosing a copy of a communication upon the subject, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a statement from the superintendent of statistics of the commercial relations of the United States with foreign nations, for the year ending 30th September, 1857; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, showing the manner in which the contingent fund of that Department has been expended during the year ending 30th June, 1857; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Hon. N. P. BANKS, of the date of 24th December last, informing the Speaker that he had placed in the hands of the Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts his resignation of the office of Representative of the seventh congressional district of that State; and that from and after the date thereof, his seat would be vacant; which was laid upon the table.

Also, a communication from the Navy Department, containing an abstract of offers received at the Bureau of Yards and Docks for furnishing articles falling under the cognizance of that bureau during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1858; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ARREST OF WILLIAM WALKER.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ask the adoption of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's table. I hope the House will consider it at once. If there should be objection, I shall move to suspend the rules.

Mr. SAVAGE. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that the resolution which he proposes will lead to discussion—a discussion, perhaps, which will consume the day. There are many members who have bills which they wish to introduce, of which they have given previous notice. They desire to introduce them for reference merely, that the committees may get to work upon them without delay. I suggest that such opportunity may be given before the gentleman introduces his resolution.

The resolution was not withdrawn. It was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interests, all the information in his possession in relation to the late seizure of General William Walker and his followers in Nicaragua, together with such instructions as may have been given to our naval officers and other officials, pertaining to the subject.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would like to have the gentleman modify his resolution so as also to call for all information in the President's possession in regard to the fitting-out of the expedition by Mr. Walker in this country.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would do so with great pleasure had I the power. I suppose the resolution is now broad enough to cover what the gentleman desires. If not, and the resolution is introduced under a suspension of the rules, he can move to amend it, and I will give him an opportunity to make that motion. It being the report of a committee, the gentleman knows that I cannot amend it. If I could, I would do so very cheerfully.

The rules were then suspended for the introduction of the resolution; there being, on a division—ayes 117, noes 7.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I did not expect to have said anything upon the resolution, but it seems to me that the opposition of gentlemen around me renders a word necessary. I think one moment's reflection will satisfy the House that it is important that the resolution should be adopted. And in reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] I will say that if he will offer the amendment to which he referred, I will vote for it.

I ought, perhaps, to say a few words about the form of this resolution, and the reasons why the committee made the call in this mode. I think it is broad enough to cover the ground indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee. It calls for all the information in the President's possession in regard to the seizure. Of course the President will be likely to inform the House what this man has been doing, as a reason why he was seized. It also calls for all instructions given to our officers. Yet if the gentleman from Tennessee is not satisfied with that, why, let him move an amendment calling for any further information, and opening the doors as wide as possible, and I shall be ready to vote for it. Every gentleman will see, upon a moment's reflection, that this is a question of much importance, and one which the House cannot overlook. It involves three considerations of sufficient importance.

In the first place, there is a question in relation to the rights of Walker and his followers, who have been seized. Whether they have any claim upon us or not, is a question of only minor importance. Then there is a second question, with reference to the rights of Nicaragua, or Costa Rica, or whoever owns the territory which has been invaded. But, sir, there is still a question of far more importance, so far as this House and the country are concerned, which does not depend upon either of these. It appears that one of our officers—whether with the authority of the President or not it is not now necessary to inquire—has, at the head of a large body of armed men, gone into a territory that does not belong to the United States, and carried away by force one or two hundred persons. This will strike everybody as an act of war, and its justification does not depend at all upon either of the other questions. For example, suppose—for mere argument's sake—Walker was as bad a man as you can imagine him to be: this would not justify his seizure in that mode. Why, sir, there are bad men in all the countries of the world; but that does not justify our officers in marching into those countries and arresting them without any authority from Congress. Whether Nicaragua does or does not object to this proceeding, is wholly immaterial. Suppose Nicaragua had been invaded by a foreign army, and one of our officers had assisted her to expel it: she would not have complained of the invasion of her territory. If rebellion or civil war had prevailed there and our officers had gone in to put it down or to take sides in it, why, of course, the triumphant party would not complain. I have no sort of doubt that if, during the revolution in Paris in 1848, American troops had gone there and put down the revolution, Louis Philippe, the monarch, would not have complained of the invasion of his territory.

Mr. RITCHIE. I desire to make a single remark just at this point, to show the light in which I regard the late act of Commodore Paulding. That act, sir, was justifiable on this ground: that Walker was a fugitive from the criminal laws of this country, and the officer of any country dispatched in pursuit of a criminal has a right to arrest him anywhere, with the consent of the Government of the country in which the fugitive has sought an asylum.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hear the suggestion of my friend from Pennsylvania with great pleasure, although I do not concur with him. I think that on reflection he will see that that does not justify, in any respect, a movement of this kind. Suppose a fugitive from this country were to flee into Canada, or to London, or Paris, and our officers, with troops, were to follow him there and bring him away by force: the gentleman will perceive at once how that would involve us. We have a right to demand from some foreign Governments, in some cases, the extradition of the fugitive, but not to arrest him by force upon a foreign soil.

But, Mr. Speaker, my object in rising was not to enter into a justification or censure of Walker's movements, but to show the House that, whether the man was criminal or not, it does not affect the present question. Congress may authorize an interference in the affairs of a foreign country; they may make a declaration of war; but as the Constitution gives to Congress alone the war-making power, the point must strike every one that our officials have no right to perform acts of war until authorized by a declaration of Congress. Whether Walker was an invader of Nicaragua, or was a rebel, or a party to civil war in that country, in any point of view our officials could not take part in the contest, unless authorized by Congress to do so. It is because the war-making power is one of the most important that Congress is invested with, that I think it our duty to look into this question at once.

Mr. GROW. I would suggest to the gentleman that, when we get the information called for in his resolution, it will then be the proper time to discuss this question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am infinitely obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the suggestion, and I agree with him on that point. I do not now propose to discuss the facts involved in this matter, but to indicate points of view in which it may be important. Another great question must suggest itself to the mind of every gentleman. We have for years had a struggle going on with Great Britain as to the dominion or control of these Central American States, and have often complained of the acts of her officials there; but if we justify this act of Commodore Paulding, may not Great Britain interfere as she pleases in imitation of this precedent? If we can thus interfere, may not Great Britain do the same? And shall we then have any right to complain? This proceeding may, too, be a violation of the Bulwer-Clayton treaty? In this point of view I hold that the Government is bound to disavow this act, or Great Britain may do whatever she thinks proper hereafter.

But again, sir: are we to leave to our naval officers the discretion to do acts of this sort? It may turn out that, in this particular instance, it will give rise to no difficulty; but if our naval officers are to be allowed to go into foreign countries to make seizures, the result will be that Congress will be stripped of the war-making power. Even the President could not have authorized it; and shall we leave the power to subordinate officers? It seems to me that this is a question of sufficient importance to justify its investigation, no matter what gentlemen may think of Walker. They will recollect, doubtless, that when Commodore Porter undertook to seize some pirates, on a foreign territory, he was disgraced for the act. They will remember, too, the excitement produced when certain British subjects seized the steamer Caroline. We were nearly involved in a war with Great Britain because that steamer, at the time of the seizure, was on the American side of the Niagara river. I mention these things in order that gentlemen may see the importance of maintaining our claim to the war-making power, and preventing subordinate officers from involving us in difficulty.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the fact stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITCHIE] is admitted by him—that General Walker, when last in Nicaragua, was a criminal and a fugitive from justice?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I make no admission on that point. But even if that be true, the matter ought to be inquired into none the less. Whether General Walker be meritorious, or the reverse, does not affect the view I take of the question.

Mr. RITCHIE. I do not intend to make any charge, as the facts are not before the House. My position is taken on the supposition that Walker did violate the neutrality laws of the country, and made himself liable to punishment. I wish to have it understood that I make no charge against anybody until we have the facts before us officially.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself understand each other. My object is to get at the facts.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to a question of order. I object to the discussion of the merits of Nicaraguan affairs upon a resolution calling upon the President for information. I am prepared to vote for the resolution, but I am not prepared to commit myself generally upon this question, and I apprehend that no other gentleman on this floor is prepared to commit himself until we are properly advised of the facts. It seems to me that the investigation of Walker's conduct in Nicaragua, or of the conduct of the Administration, cannot properly be entered into on a resolution of this character.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I merely desire to add to the remarks I have already made, that I have no doubt the House will get the information called for in my resolution very promptly.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, obtained the floor. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas rose to a question of order.

Mr. WARREN. If the gentleman from North Carolina has concluded his remarks, I merely desire to move the previous question. We can debate this question more sensibly when we have all the facts before us.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit that a gentleman cannot rise to a question of order and then move the previous question.

Mr. WARREN. Well, sir, I will not insist on it. I merely suggest that, in my opinion, that is the proper course for the House to pursue.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I agree, sir, with the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] that it is right we should have all the information in the possession of the President touching the recent capture and return to this country of Mr. William Walker. I also think it would be right and proper for the President, in giving that information, at the same time to inform the House and country—

Mr. WARREN. I now rise to the question of order which I made before, and shall press it upon the gentleman from Tennessee. I hold that debate in relation to the conduct of Walker and the Administration is illegitimate and improper upon the resolution before the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit to the Speaker that I am not discussing that at all; but am speaking as to the character of the information that is wanted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it is entirely competent for the gentleman to give his views as to the reasons why the information should or should not be furnished.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to another question of order. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether this matter has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. STANTON. Then I wish to know upon what authority have they made a report on a question not referred to them? I call for the reading of the 94th rule, which prescribes what shall be the duties of that committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I submit that it is too late to raise the question of order. The House has suspended the rules to admit the resolution, and it is now regularly before the House.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the question of order comes too late, inasmuch as the House has suspended the rules and admitted the resolution. If the question had been raised before the rules had been suspended, the Chair is inclined to the opinion that the point of order would have been well taken.

Mr. STANTON. I hardly see how the suspension of the rules can affect it. That is merely a matter of priority of business. It would not make the resolution in order.

The SPEAKER. The House has suspended its rules to admit the resolution, and ordered that it shall be considered immediately.

Mr. STANTON. Very well. All I care for is to have it understood that I do not waive the point whenever it is proper to make it.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know whether this resolution, which calls for information, can be entertained and considered at this time, except by unanimous consent? The 60th rule provides:

"A proposition requesting information from the President of the United States, or directing it to be furnished by the head of either of the Executive Departments, or by the Postmaster General, or to print an extra number of any document or other matter, excepting messages of the President to both Houses at the commencement of each session of Congress, and the reports and documents connected with or referred to in it, shall lie on the table one day for consideration, unless otherwise ordered by the unanimous consent of the House."

I submit, therefore, that the resolution must lie over for one day, unless by the unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The House has, by a vote of 117 to 7, suspended its rules, that it might consider the resolution immediately.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. In addition to the information called for by the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina, I think it is right and proper that we should have all the information in the possession of the President, touching the fitting out of an expedition in this country by a foreigner who had expatriated himself, to go to a country the Government of which was at peace with this Government. I desire, therefore, that the resolution shall be so amended that the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House all the information in his possession, touching and relating to the outfit of an expedition by William Walker in the United States, and its leaving our country to go to Nicaragua, in which country he was captured and sent back to the United States.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the gentleman will allow me, I have drawn up an additional resolution, which will meet the suggestion he has made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will hear it read, and will merely remark that, under the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the President may communicate the information desired; but he may not do so, and still comply with the requirements of the resolution.

Mr. FAULKNER's amendment was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House (if, in his opinion, not incompatible with the public interest) the facts and information which rendered it probable that William Walker was engaged, during the past summer and fall, in preparing, within the limits of the United States, in violation of an act of Congress of the 29th of April, 1813, the means for a military enterprise against the people and territory of Nicaragua; also, copies of all instructions, orders, and letters, addressed by and to the various officers of the Government in relation thereto; together with such other measures as may have been adopted by the Government to arrest such unlawful enterprise, and to execute in good faith the neutrality laws, embracing the instructions, if any, under the authority of which Captain Paulding demanded and enforced, within the territorial limits of Nicaragua, the surrender of Walker and his command; together with any letters, orders, and instructions, since the surrender of Walker, showing how far, and to what extent, the use of our naval force, for this purpose, by Captain Paulding, has been approved or disapproved by the Government of the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think that resolution will meet my object, and I therefore offer it as an additional resolution, and demand the previous question.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will, if the gentleman wishes to make any suggestions.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Do I understand that to be offered as an additional resolution?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I have no objection to it.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. There is one view in which I think that this is of much more importance than would really seem to be intended by the resolution as it is at present couched. There is the position of Walker to be contemplated in connection with the information which is sought to be derived from the Executive. The question of what may have been his status at the time he took his departure from this country, in respect to the laws of this country, is quite as important as any other question that arises in the matter—whether his position was that of a citizen of the United States, or a citizen of another Government? I hope, therefore, that when this inquiry is made, it will be made with reference to the whole circle of facts and circumstances which in any degree can be made to bear upon this great and important question.

Whatever may have been the position of Mr. Walker in this Union, regarding any attempt, or conspiracy, or confederation, on his part, in connection with his friends, to violate the neutrality laws, it is very material, in that connection, to ask what was his position at the time he left these shores in regard to the laws of this country? It is important to ascertain, when we are inquiring in reference to the acts of the individual, under what atmosphere, legal or otherwise, he was acting, and by what authority he assumed to act. If his authority was an assumption against the laws of the United States, certainly that fact will, in regard to his own individual acts, clear the position that he occupies in regard to the Government against which he erred himself.

I therefore ask that this resolution may be so modified as to inquire what was his relation in respect to the laws of this country, either by overt acts, by indictment, by warrant, or otherwise.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, my object is to demand the previous question; and, in justification of my course, I will say that I desire to be heard upon this subject at the proper time; but I do not think this debate ought to occur now; for in justice to ourselves and the interests involved, we ought to know accurately the facts of the case and the position of our Government.

In my opinion, this question connects itself with great and vital interests, as well as the peace and quiet of the country, and demands the most enlightened and deliberate consideration. The acts of General Walker and his followers can have but little weight in determining the policy necessary for this Government to adopt in regard to Central American affairs. My opinions were, to some extent, expressed upon this subject in 1850, in a speech in this House, in opposition to the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, which I then denounced in the strongest terms I could employ. I consider that treaty "the great first cause" of all the troubles that now threaten us. It was a clear abandonment of our rights and the policy of our past history; and I shall rejoice if the Administration shall announce the doctrine that all changes in regard to the people and territory south of us must be made by the consent and for the benefit of the people of the United States.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I should like it if the gentleman will withdraw his call for the previous question, to let me introduce an amendment.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will hear the amendment before I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. My amendment merely enlarges the call, so that we may have all the facts before us.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And further to communicate to this House whether, prior to said arrest, the Government of the United States had undertaken, by treaty or other arrangement with the existing Government of Nicaragua, to protect said Government in the peaceable enjoyment of the transit route through Nicaragua between the Caribbean sea and the Pacific ocean, or otherwise to assume the protectorate over the said route by the arms of the United States if necessary.

Mr. SAVAGE. I believe that the amendment is well intended, but I presume that all the information it asks for will be furnished under the resolution, as it is now before the House. I insist on the call for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Not at all. Mine is a different branch of inquiry.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question. I will renew it.

Mr. SAVAGE. If I withdraw it for one, I must for all. I think that the resolution as it is, sufficiently provides for all the information which may be desired.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If the call for the previous question is not seconded, will not my amendment be then in order?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The call for the previous question was not seconded; only thirty-five members voting therefor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I submit the amendment which has just been read for the information of the House. I do not propose at this time to discuss the question. I merely want to get the call, so that the President of the United States can communicate, not only the facts in reference to the alleged violation of the neutrality laws by Mr. Walker and his associates, but also the extent to which this Government has assumed a protectorate over the transit route, by any arrangement with the government of Martinez. It may operate to shield the officer of the Navy for a violation of the sovereignty of Nicaragua, in one view of the case; and in another, it will serve to enable the representatives of the American people to move with an understanding of the whole case. I call for the previous question.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question, in order that I may submit an amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Let the amendment be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And that the President be also requested to inform this House whether the Government of Nicaragua has made any complaint against our Government on account of the act of Captain Paulding in arresting Walker and his followers.

Mr. KELSEY. I hope there will be no objection to the amendment, as it simply enlarges the scope of the call for information.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, declined to withdraw the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from New York would not be in order, inasmuch as there is an amendment to an amendment now pending.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask, will members have an opportunity to vote separately on the several propositions pending?

The SPEAKER. If a division be called for before the call for the previous question is seconded, it is in order, according to the practice of the House.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Then I ask for a division of the question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If I understand the question, there is a resolution, an amendment, and an amendment to an amendment. Of course the House will have an opportunity to vote for or against each of these propositions separately.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is all I desire.

The call for the previous question was seconded; there being, on a division—yeas 95, noes 28; and the main question was then ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask if it is in order to extend that resolution to other Central American States?

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order, the previous question having been seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CURTIS. Because a treaty with Costa Rica may have been made.

Mr. LETCHER. I call for the yeas and nays, as this relates to a treaty which has not yet been made public.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 155, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Boccock, Boyce, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Case, Caskie, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Curry, Curtis, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatell, Hickman, Hoard, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knap, Landy, Lawrence, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Pettit, Peyton, Phillips, Potter, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ritchie, Robbins, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippe, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Wilson, Winslow, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollieffer—155.

NAYS—Messrs. Bliss, Dewart, Faulkner, Greenwood, Gregg, Keitt, Letcher, Phelps, Stephens, George Taylor, Warren, Whiteley, and Augustus R. Wright—13.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was then agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. CLINGMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

PAPERS FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution.

Mr. WARREN. I rise to what I believe to be a privileged question. It is in relation to my position touching the vote which has just been taken.

Mr. KEITT. That is no question of privilege.

Mr. WARREN. I think it is.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

Mr. WARREN. I wished to say that while I was in favor of the original resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, because it calls on the President for the exposition of a treaty not yet confirmed and made public.

The resolution offered by Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House furnish the members the same number of daily newspapers furnished the last Congress, and on the same terms.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Was there not a resolution like that adopted some days since?

The SPEAKER. No; this is the first of the kind offered this session.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARREST OF WILLIAM WALKER—AGAIN.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether the Government of Nicaragua has made any complaint against our Government on account of the act of Captain Paulding in arresting William Walker and his followers within the territory of Nicaragua.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. KELSEY. Then I move to suspend the rules.

The rules were suspended.

Mr. KELSEY demanded the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. KELSEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, merely for the purpose of reference.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to give way to me, to make a motion that the States be called for bills and resolutions to which there shall be no objection.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I then move that the States be called through, and that gentlemen having bills which they wish to report, merely for the purpose of reference to the different committees of the House, may have the privilege of doing so.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does that cover resolutions?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It includes resolutions to which there is no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let there be inserted a condition that objections are not to be cut off by the previous question. If resolutions are to be put through under the previous question, I will object.

Mr. LETCHER. How far did we progress when the States were called under the former call? I am for beginning at the point where we stopped then.

The SPEAKER. The call had gone as far as the State of New York.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, then, if the call be commenced there, I have no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I modify my proposition, so as to provide that the call shall commence where the call last left off.

The resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER commenced the call of the States, beginning with New York.

HARLEM RIVER.

Mr. HASKIN presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York in favor of the passage of a bill by Congress to remove obstructions in the Harlem river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WESTERN LAKES AND RIVERS.

Mr. HATCH offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate as early as possible to the House of Representatives, a statement of the present condition of the works of improvement upon the northern and northwestern lakes and western rivers, with such information as he can procure of their commerce.

OSWEGO HARBOR.

Mr. GOODWIN introduced a bill to continue the improvement of the harbor of Oswego, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

Mr. KELSEY introduced a bill to reduce and equalize the mileage of members of Congress; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Mileage.

DUNKIRK HARBOR.

Mr. FENTON introduced a bill for continuing the improvement of the harbor at Dunkirk, New York, on Lake Erie; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FENTON. I desire to offer a resolution.
Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a question of order. Under the resolution adopted by the House, the gentleman from New York cannot legitimately offer more than one bill or resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman objects to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. GROW. I thought the understanding was that any resolution might be introduced to which there was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects to the resolution.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That Lewis Benedict have permission to withdraw his papers from the files of the Clerk's office, for the purpose of filing them in the Indian office.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it not customary to leave copies of the papers withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. Not when they are withdrawn for the purpose of reference to the Departments; but only when they are finally withdrawn from the files of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

COLLECTION DISTRICTS, ETC.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE introduced a bill establishing the collection districts of the United States, and designating the ports of entry and ports of delivery in the same, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ISSUE OF A REGISTER.

Mr. HATCH introduced a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register or enrollment to the vessel called the James McIndoe, now owned by Thomas Coatsworth, James G. Coatsworth, and William Coatsworth, of Buffalo, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

UTAH AFFAIRS.

Mr. BENNETT. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to this House all the information he may possess of the existing state of things in the Territory of Utah, and whether or not the people of said Territory are in a state of insurrection or rebellion; also, a statement of the number of United States troops ordered to said Territory, with a copy of the orders and instructions given to the officer in command; also, the position and condition of said troops at the latest intelligence; with all such other information relating to the condition of said Territory, and of the military force ordered to the same, as he may deem proper to communicate.

Mr. PHELPS. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that he modify his resolution so as not to call for the instructions given to the officer commanding the troops sent against the people of Utah.

Mr. SAVAGE. I understand that the resolution under which we are now acting provides that resolutions are to be introduced for reference only.

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding of the Chair. Is the resolution objected to?

Mr. PHELPS. I object to the resolution in its present shape; but, at the same time, I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he modify it by omitting the call for the instructions given to the commanding officer of the Utah expedition. He will thus obviate the objection that I have to it. I desire to have the resolution passed, except so far as to the instructions given to the officer in command.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that when a resolution gives rise to debate, that constitutes an objection. Does the gentleman from Missouri object to the resolution?

Mr. PHELPS. I do, sir.

Mr. KEITT. On the ground, I presume, that the House has already decided that the Territory of Utah is in a state of rebellion.

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir. I do not object to that portion of the resolution; but I do object to the portion calling for the instructions given to the commanding officer.

Mr. KEITT. The House has already determined that the Territory of Utah is in a state of rebellion, and now it is proposed to inquire whether it is so or not!

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Objection being made, the resolution was not received.

BREAKWATER IN DELAWARE BAY.

Mr. CLAWSON offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a breakwater at or near Crow shoal, in the Delaware bay, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

EQUALIZATION OF PENSIONS.

Mr. FLORENCE introduced a bill to equalize the Army, Navy, and marine pensions; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

TITLE OF CAPTAIN-IN-CHIEF.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to confer the title of captain-in-chief for eminent services.

Mr. KEITT. I object to that.

Mr. SAVAGE. If the resolution is to be referred to a committee, I will not object to its introduction.

Mr. KEITT. I object to it anyhow.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. GROW introduced a bill to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GROW. I have another bill which I desire to introduce.

Mr. LETCHER. I object; the gentleman has had his share.

Mr. GROW. I desire to introduce the bill for reference only.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has introduced one bill.

Mr. GROW. Was there, in the resolution, any limit to the number of bills a member might introduce?

The SPEAKER. There was an implied limit; at least, that is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I did not so understand the resolution. I understood that it provided that the States should be called for bills and resolutions for reference only.

The SPEAKER. Bills and resolutions to which there should be no objection.

Mr. GROW. I understand the rule to be, that when the States are regularly called, members are limited to the introduction of one resolution, but are not limited to the introduction of one bill. The resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] limits members to no specific number of bills. How, then, does the Chair imply the understanding of which he speaks? The rule of the House points us to one resolution, but not to one bill?

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House is explicit in reference to resolutions.

Mr. GROW. Certainly; but not as to bills.

The SPEAKER. The practice under it has been to allow members to introduce but one bill each.

Mr. GROW. If the Chair will hear me for a moment, I think he will see that he is mistaken. When notices of intention to introduce bills have been given, members have been allowed to introduce such bills when the States are called for resolutions.

The SPEAKER. But only one. That has been the uniform practice of the House. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania can indicate one exception to the practice, the Chair will be glad to have the ruling corrected.

Mr. GROW. I understand differently; but I will not insist upon the question of order. I have a resolution which I desire to offer.

INFORMATION ABOUT KANSAS.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House copies of all instructions by himself or any head of Department to the Governor or other executive officer in the Territory of Kansas, and all correspondence with the same, together with a copy of the executive minutes of said Territory, not already communicated to Congress. Also, a copy of the constitution formed at Le-compton, together with a copy of the census and return of the votes in the election of delegates to said convention, and the returns of the election held in said Territory on the 21st of December last, with the number of votes then polled in each election precinct in said Territory, and copies of any other official papers in possession of the Secretary of State relative to Kansas affairs, not already communicated to Congress.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask leave to introduce a bill.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object. The gentleman has already introduced one.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. I have the authority of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] and of other members around me, that it has been the custom under the call of the States for resolutions to introduce more than one bill for each member.

Mr. SAVAGE. I do not withdraw my objection till after each member has had an opportunity of getting in one bill.

DELAWARE RIVER.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill making appropriations for the continuance of the harbor improvements in the river Delaware; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BRANCH MINT AT NEW YORK.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to offer a bill to establish a branch of the Mint of the United States at the city of New York, and have it referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object.

TOBACCO MANUFACTURE.

Mr. BOCOCK offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the proceedings of the late convention of tobacco manufacturers, held at the city of Richmond on the 3d day of December, 1857, together with all memorials of tobacco manufacturers, and others, touching the subjects considered by said convention, be referred to a select committee of five members.

Mr. MORGAN. If the gentleman will refer the subject to the Committee on Agriculture, I will make no objection. That is the proper place for it, and it is probably the only business that committee will have before them the present session.

Mr. BOCOCK. If the gentleman insists on his objection, I will give the subject the reference he desires. My reasons for referring the matter to a special committee are, that the subject is one in which the interests of the constituents of only a few of us are concerned. I wished, therefore, to have it referred to a committee which will take the trouble to consider the subject and report on it.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt the Committee on Agriculture will give the subject all the attention the gentleman desires.

Mr. BOCOCK. Very well; if the gentleman insists on his objection, I will modify the resolution so as to refer the subject to the Committee on Agriculture.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

OMISSION IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to introduce a bill to supply an omission in the enrollment of a certain act therein named.

Mr. BENNETT. I object.

WASHINGTON ELECTIONS.

Mr. GOODE, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill regulating the municipal elections in the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

NORTH CAROLINA CHEROKEES.

Mr. CLINGMAN introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs inquire into the expediency of amending the fourth and fifth sections of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department," &c., approved 29th July, 1848, so as to regulate the payment of the interest due the North Carolina Cherokees on funds held in trust for them by the United States, under said act, so as to estimate the interest on what remains due in each year, on the 29th of July, agreeably to a census roll of said Indians; and in case of the death of any of the Indians, to estimate the interest to the time of payment, which, with the principal of $58 33, to be paid over to the legal representatives of said Indians remaining in the State of North Carolina at the time of payment; and in case of there being no heirs-at-law to receive it, then to pay over the same to the survivors of that portion of the tribe and their legal representatives, in accordance with the laws of the State.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to inquire whether that is an instruction to the committee to so report, or a mere matter of inquiry?

Mr. CLINGMAN. A mere matter of inquiry. The resolution was adopted.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. GILMER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the annual amounts of the public lands that have been sold or disposed of by the United States, and of the annual amounts that have been granted to the States and corporations and companies, and to individuals respectively, with the dates of the grants and appropriations, and for what purposes granted; also, the amounts paid to the several States respectively as a percentage on the sums received by the United States upon the sales of the public lands; and that he report also the amount of public lands yet remaining to the United States.

TEXAS MOUNTED VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. KEITT. I introduce a bill, prepared by my friend from Texas, [Mr. BRYAN,] who is of the opinion that the exigency of the moment demands its passage at an early day. It is entitled "A bill to raise and organize for the defense of the frontier of Texas one regiment of mounted volunteers."

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRICT COURTS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. MILES introduced a bill to alter the time of holding the United States district courts in South Carolina; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOYCE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed, to which shall be referred to inquire into and report on the following subjects, viz:

- A reduction of the expenditures of the Government;
- The navigation laws of the United States;
- The existing duties on imports; and
- The expediency of a gradual repeal of all duties on imports, and a resort exclusively to internal taxation.

Mr. SAVAGE. I think that this will give rise to debate, and I therefore object.

Mr. BOYCE. I do not think that it will give rise to debate.

Mr. SAVAGE. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I renew the objection.

GEORGIA VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. GARTRELL introduced a bill to grant bounty land to the officers and soldiers of Captains Joseph H. Burk's and Wm. D. Alexander's companies of Meriwether county (Georgia) volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COURT-HOUSE, ETC., IN ALABAMA.

Mr. DOWDELL introduced a bill authorizing the construction of a building at Montgomery, State of Alabama, for a court-house and post office; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GRADUATION ACT.

Mr. HOUSTON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the act approved August 4, 1854, "to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands to actual settlers and cultivators," that any citizen of the United States, for his or her own use, may enter three hundred and twenty acres of the public lands at the prices therein specified.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, objected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, objected.

TERRITORIAL ACT OF UTAH.

Mr. COBB submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to inquire into and report to this House, by bill or otherwise, if in their opinion it would not be expedient to repeal the territorial act of Utah, and attach said Territory to other Territories or States adjoining thereto.

Mr. COBB. I ask leave to offer another resolution.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a question of order. I hold that I have the right to introduce more than one resolution. If the Chair decide against me, I will quote precedents.

Mr. SAVAGE. The Speaker has already decided the point.

Mr. COBB. The same point was raised on me while Mr. Boyd was Speaker. Mr. Boyd first sustained the point of order, but subsequently he sustained me in the ground I took. Old members here are well satisfied that I have a right to introduce more than one resolution.

Mr. SAVAGE. I hold that the gentleman has no right to introduce more than one resolution under the understanding of members when the order was made under which we are now acting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Alabama, and decides that he has no right to offer the resolution when objected to. He refers him to the 25th rule.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman objects, I know I have no right to submit it.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object to the gentleman introducing more than one.

NEW ORLEANS RAILROAD.

Mr. BARKSDALE introduced a bill making a grant of land to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, to aid in the construction of the New Orleans, Jackson, and Great Northern railroad; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENT OF THE NEUTRALITY LAW.

Mr. QUITMAN asked unanimous consent to introduce a bill to repeal certain sections of the act passed April 20, 1818, commonly called the neutrality law, and to modify other sections thereof.

Mr. GROW. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection hardly in time, as the Clerk had commenced the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GROW. I did not understand what the bill was until after it was read the first time.

Objection being made, the bill was not introduced.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, ETC., AT VICKSBURG.

Mr. SINGLETON offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object to that bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is the objection in time? The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The gentleman did not make the objection until the bill had been twice read. The objection, therefore, comes too late.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I could not understand the nature of the bill until its title had been twice read, and therefore could not make the objection sooner.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. MAYNARD. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of increasing the compensation now allowed to the clerks of the circuit and district courts, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object, for the reason that the gentleman has already offered one bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that objection tenable? This is the first resolution I have submitted. I offered a bill when I was last up.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is objected to; and, under the order of the House, it cannot be entertained. The order of the House is that only such resolutions as are not objected to shall be received.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to suspend the rules. The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion at this time.

LAKE MICHIGAN IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. COLFAX. I desire to introduce a bill making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the harbor of refuge at Michigan City, on Lake Michigan, and for the construction of a breakwater thereat.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I send up to the Clerk's desk, and ask the House to adopt, the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed by the Speaker, to investigate all the facts and circumstances connected with the sale of the military reservation at Fort Snelling, the manner in which said sale was made, to whom made, the consideration paid, the terms of payment, whether the price paid or agreed to be paid was adequate or not, and whether the said reserve, at the time of said sale, was longer wanted for the public service; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths to witnesses.

Mr. PHELPS. I object.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I give notice, then, that I will, as soon as the call of the States for resolutions is completed, move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the resolution.

Mr. PHELPS. If the gentleman will move to refer the matter to one of the standing committees I will not object.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the investigation will be made, and that it will be made by one of the standing committees of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not object.

Mr. PHELPS. I do not object to the investigation. I object to the raising of a select committee.

Mr. FAULKNER. We hope there will be no objection. We demand the investigation, if it is asked for by any man in this House. I hope it will be made in the manner in which the gentleman asks it.

Mr. PHELPS. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I simply wish to say that I do not wish to be a member of that committee, and decline most emphatically being its chairman.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he should amend his resolution so as to give the committee the power to report at any time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is implied.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope my colleague [Mr. PHILLIPS] will withdraw that suggestion. I do not like to have any lion in the path of business here. We might as well have the Committee on Public Lands making their reports all the time.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I accept the amendment.

The resolution as modified was then adopted.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGER BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think that bill should go to the Committee on Commerce. I make that motion.

Mr. LETCHER. Is there a port of entry or delivery there?

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I hope my colleague will not insist on his motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Very well, I will withdraw it.

LEONARD LOOMIS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Leonard Loomis," approved June 28, 1838; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

DEPOSITS IN THE TREASURIES.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to introduce a bill to authorize the deposit of gold and silver coin, bullion, and gold dust, in the Treasuries therein named, and the issuance of certificates therefor, convenient for use and circulation.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, when I say to him that there is nothing in that bill which points towards a bank, of any character whatever. It merely provides for authority to make deposits and have certificates issued therefor which may go into circulation. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, and allow the bill to go to the committee.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to reply to the gentleman, but I shall be called to order if I do so. The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT PEORIA.

Mr. KELLOGG introduced a bill to authorize the holding of terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States at the city of Peoria; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REBELLION IN UTAH.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, asked leave to introduce a bill to suppress rebellion in the Territory of Utah.

Mr. KEITT objected.

PROPERTY LOST IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

Mr. PHELPS introduced a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment for horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

POST ROUTES IN MISSOURI.

Mr. PHELPS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from Greenfield and Lamar, in the State of Missouri, to Fort Scott, in Kansas Territory. Also, a post road from Vienna to Tusculumbia, in the State of Missouri.

OVERLAND MAIL TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize the contractors for carrying the overland mail from the Mississippi river to San Francisco, under the act of Congress approved the 3d of March, 1857, to adopt any route they may select to carry the same upon; and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BLAIR. The only objection I have to that motion is that it will delay action on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question under the rules will be, first on the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLAIR. I accept the gentleman's motion as a modification of my own.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REBELLION IN UTAH.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I understand that the gentleman who objected to the introduction of my bill, is willing to withdraw his objection, and let it be referred.

Mr. KEITT. I withdraw my objection for that purpose.

Mr. STANTON. The title of the bill is to suppress rebellion in Utah. That subject has already been properly referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and they can originate whatever measure they please. I renew the objection.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal an act entitled, "An act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved February 4, 1855.

Mr. CHAFFEE objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I presume, sir, that the Committee of Claims is the proper committee to which this bill should be referred, as it is to that committee is referred the action of the court upon claims presented and tried before it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I dislike to make objection; but I move to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GRADUATION ACT.

Mr. WARREN asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill making the graduation act apply to the lands belonging to the Government, within the six miles on either side of grants of public lands, to aid in the construction of railroads.

Mr. LETCHER objected.

Mr. LEACH introduced a bill making appropriation for the improvement of St. Mary's Falls ship canal in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

GRAND RIVER, MICHIGAN.

Mr. WALBRIDGE introduced a bill making appropriation for the construction of a harbor at the mouth of Grand river, in the State of Michigan; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I ask leave to introduce another bill.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

HARBOR OF MONROE, MICHIGAN.

Mr. WALDRON asked leave to introduce a bill making appropriation for the harbor at Monroe, Michigan.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, objected.

DES MOINES LAND GRANT.

Mr. CURTIS asked leave to introduce a bill to amend an act granting land to the Territory of Iowa, to aid in the improvement of the Des Moines river, in said Territory.

Mr. BURNETT objected.

BOUNDARIES OF IOWA.

Mr. CURTIS asked leave to introduce a bill to extend the western boundary of the State of Iowa, to the Missouri river.

Mr. GROW objected.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection. It is entirely a local matter.

Mr. GROW. I adhere to my objection. We have already had that subject before the Committee on Territories.

CONFIRMATION OF LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. CURTIS introduced a joint resolution to ratify and confirm certain land entries; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CURTIS. I have another resolution to offer.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman tried twice to introduce bills, and failed to get them in. Now, having finally got in a resolution, I think he has had his share, and I object to the gentleman introducing any other bill or resolution.

BRIDGE AT ROCK ISLAND.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire if the railroad bridge across the Mississippi river, at Rock Island, Illinois, is a serious obstruction to the navigation of said river; and if so, to report to this House what action, if any, is necessary on the part of the Government to cause such obstruction to be removed.

HARBOR OF RACINE, ETC.

Mr. POTTER asked consent to introduce a bill for continuing the improvement of the harbors of Racine, Kenosha, and Milwaukee, on Lake Michigan, in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. BARKSDALE objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection came too late.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I objected before the bill had been read a second time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection did come too late, and rules accordingly.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FEES, ETC., IN COURTS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. SCOTT introduced a bill to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed marshals, district attorneys, clerks of courts, jurors, and witnesses, in the State of California, and the Territories of Oregon and Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ASAHEL BUSH.

Mr. LANE introduced a joint resolution authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Asahel Bush, public printer of the Territory of Oregon; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. LETCHER. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Oregon if that resolution involves a question in regard to any law under which this account accrued?

Mr. LANE. The territorial printer of Oregon, by direction of the Legislature, executed certain printing, for which he has not been paid. An appropriation for that purpose, which has long since been made, has not been expended, and the object of the joint resolution is to provide that out of the money appropriated for that purpose, this man may be paid for the services rendered. We ask for no money.

Mr. LETCHER. If the money has been appropriated for this particular purpose, and this man did the work, I cannot see why he cannot get the money.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been referred.

MILITARY ROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. LANE introduced a bill making an appropriation for the completion of the military road from Astoria to Salem, in Oregon Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LANE. I have another bill I desire to introduce.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I must object, unless there is a general relaxation of the rule. I design, when the Territories have been called, to introduce a resolution that all the States and Territories be called again.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let the Delegates get in their bills.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. No, sir; I must insist on my objection; but the difficulty will be obviated in a few moments, I trust, by the adoption of the resolution which I design to offer.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. OTERO. I ask leave to introduce a bill to ascertain and settle private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object.

SURVEYOR GENERAL OF NEW MEXICO, ETC.

Mr. OTERO. I ask leave, then, to introduce a bill supplemental to an act approved July 22, 1854, entitled "An act to establish the office of surveyor general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes."

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I must object, for the same reason that I objected to the bill of the gentleman from Oregon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico has not yet introduced one bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Then I withdraw the objection; let him get in one bill.

The bill was then read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. OTERO. I have other bills which I desire to offer.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I object.

ROADS IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington, introduced a bill for the completion of military roads in the Territory of Washington; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. I have another bill which I desire to offer.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I feel bound to object.

COURTS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. FERGUSON introduced a bill in relation to courts, and the holding of the terms thereof, in the Territory of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FERGUSON. I have also a resolution which I desire to submit.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I object.

RESOLUTIONS OF MAINE.

Mr. ABBOTT presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine, relating to foreign paupers and criminals; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SUPPRESSION OF POLYGAMY.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill to punish and prevent the practice of polygamy in the Territories of the United States, and other places; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask that the bill may be read. I must know what it proposes before I can tell whether to object to it or not.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been read a second time. What committee does the gentleman from Vermont propose to refer it to?

Mr. MORRILL. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. READY. I suppose the Committee on the Judiciary would be the appropriate committee to which to refer it.

Mr. GROW. No, sir. It belongs to the Committee on Territories. The domestic institutions of the Territories are under the control of that committee.

Mr. READY. The bill proposes, as I understand it, to pass a law imposing a penalty for, or providing for the punishment of crime; and I think, therefore, that it comes properly under the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. If the House prefers that it should receive that reference, I have no objection.

Mr. KEITT. I object to that reference; and move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL. I will not press the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. KEITT. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. GROW. I desire to read the rule defining the duties of the Committee on Territories, and the House will then see that this bill properly belongs to that committee. The rule is as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Territories to examine into the legislative, civil, and criminal proceedings of the Territories, and to devise and report to the House such means as, in their opinion, may be necessary to secure the rights and privileges of residents and non-residents."

Now, this bill relates to the domestic institutions of one of the Territories. It properly belongs, therefore, to the Committee on Territories, and I hope the House will refer it to that committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose it is not in order to debate this question; but I suggest to the House that the Congress of the United States has no general jurisdiction over this subject; they could not legislate upon it. I think the reference suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] is the proper one, because I believe that polygamy is practiced more generally in the naval profession than in any other. [Laughter.]

The bill was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HALF PAY TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

Mr. WALTON, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to continue in force an act granting half pay to certain widows and orphans; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

MEASUREMENT, ETC., OF VESSELS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws regulating the admeasurement of American ships and vessels, so as to provide that the number of tons burden, or stowage capacity, of every vessel sailing under an American register, shall be set forth in her regular sailing papers.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to introduce a bill to extend to the inhabitants of the District of Columbia certain rights of popular sovereignty.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object.

POST OFFICE, ETC., AT HARTFORD.

Mr. CLARK, of Connecticut, introduced a bill for the construction of a suitable building for the accommodation of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and the several offices connected therewith, and the post office, at Hartford, Connecticut.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object. This is no time to appropriate money for such purposes.

TOBACCO MANUFACTURERS—AGAIN.

Mr. BOCK. I rise to what I suppose to be a question of privilege. I offered a resolution this morning to refer certain papers and proceedings of tobacco manufacturers to the Committee on Agriculture. Upon reflection, I think the Committee on Manufactures would be the proper committee. If there be objection to the change of reference, I shall move a reconsideration. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make the change.

No objection was made; and the papers were accordingly referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

CALL OF THE STATES—AGAIN.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I now desire to introduce a resolution that the States be again called for resolutions, and that members shall not be restricted to the introduction of one bill each.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Has the call been completed?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is it in order now for members who have not introduced resolutions during the call, to introduce them?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Have they not the right under the order of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The resolution which I wish to offer is this:

Resolved, That the States be again called for the introduction of bills and resolutions, to which no objection shall be made; and that, upon such call, it shall be in order for any member to introduce more than one bill or resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object, and move that the House adjourn.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion, and yield me the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will withdraw the motion at the request of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move that the rules be suspended, to enable me to introduce my resolution.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I think I am entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Tennessee withdrew the motion to adjourn, and yielded the floor to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee could withdraw the motion to adjourn, but not hold the floor, or yield it to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SAVAGE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Illinois, and BILLINGHURST, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 57.

So the motion was agreed to; and the House (at three o'clock) adjourned.

Mr. SEBASTIAN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill to extend the present graduation laws to the reserved sections within railroad grants; and

A bill to authorize the building of a jail at Van Buren, in Arkansas, for the use of the district court of the United States.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POLK, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 20) to settle doubts in relation to the title of certain common field lots in the State of Missouri, heretofore granted to the inhabitants of the city of St. Louis for the support of schools; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 41) for the relief of Manuel Leisa, Joachim Leisa, and others, and to provide for the location of certain private land claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 42) to provide for the construction of a custom-house, court-house, and post office, in Trenton, in the State of New Jersey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENJAMIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 43) to authorize the improvement of the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and Arkansas rivers by contract, and making appropriations for the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That in addition to the usual number of copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1857, there be printed ten thousand copies; five thousand copies for the use of the Senate, and five thousand copies for distribution from the Coast Survey office, and that the same be printed and bound with the plates in quarto form, and that the printing of said plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

MINISTER TO JAPAN.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of a Minister Plenipotentiary to the Empire of Japan.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I beg leave to submit the following resolution of inquiry in relation to harbors in the State of Wisconsin:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate such surveys of harbors on Lakes Superior and Michigan, in the State of Wisconsin, as have not been heretofore communicated, together with such estimates as may have been made for the improvement of said harbors.

As this is a mere resolution of inquiry, I hope the Senate will consider it now.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Several resolutions of this character have been adopted in regard to separate States, and it seems to me it would be better to get this information in regard to all the States which border on the lakes. I will, therefore, move to amend the resolution by inserting "Illinois."

Mr. JONES. I would suggest that the Mississippi and Missouri rivers also be included in the resolution. I offer an amendment to that effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin accept the proposed modifications?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly. I have no objections to the inquiry. I do not know what resolutions may have heretofore been passed on this subject, and whether it may not produce some confusion in the report of the Secretary of War; but I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution as modified.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate such surveys of harbors on Lakes Superior and Michigan, in the States of Wisconsin and Illinois, and on the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, as have not been heretofore communicated, together with such estimates as may have been made for the improvement of said harbors and rivers.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. FESSENDEN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask that this bill may be referred to a select committee. I do so for this reason: during the Thirty-Third Congress, when it was under consideration, it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it was reported back by that committee with a recommendation that it be referred to a select committee, which was done; and it seems to be proper, as it is a matter of so much importance, that it should take that course now. I presume there will be no objection to it. It has been decided by the Senate, on former occasions, to be proper. A select committee of seven, I suppose, would be the proper number.

Mr. MASON. According to my recollection that question has most generally been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I have an impression that there are instances where it has been referred to a select committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will excuse me, I will state that at the Thirty-Third Congress it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the honorable Senator was chairman, and by directions of that committee he reported it back to this body, with a recommendation that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. MASON. My recollection was not distinct. I had no recollection of its ever having been reported on by the Committee on Foreign Relations; but it seemed to me prima facie to be the proper committee to which to refer it. But if the Senator is right in his recollection, as doubtless he is—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The records have been consulted, and I am informed that it is so. I have not looked at them myself, but I think my colleague will recollect all about it. I am informed that this bill was sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations during the Thirty-Third Congress, and was reported back by that committee, with a recommendation that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not a distinct recollection about it. I have, however, this recollection, that it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations at that time, and it came back and was referred to a select committee, of which I was chairman. I do not recollect distinctly how it came back, whether on my motion in the Senate, or by the report of the committee. I am inclined to think it came back on the report of the committee, and on a suggestion I made to the chairman at that time; though I am not clear about that. I am, however, clear that it came back, and went to a select committee. The records of the Senate will show it to be so.

Mr. MASON. I should think the proper disposition of the subject would be to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and as I understand that motion has precedence, I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that will not be done, for this reason: it is a matter that has attracted considerable attention heretofore, and I am confident that the gentleman who made the statement to me in reference to the disposition made of the bill at that time, could not be mistaken. We can ascertain the fact, however, by reference to the Journal, and I will ask that the discussion may be waived for a moment, in order that I may have time to look at the Journal and see what disposition was made of it at that time.

Mr. SEWARD. I can state, for the information of the honorable Senator from Maine, and of Senators generally, that I recollect distinctly that a memorial on this subject, presented by an ex-Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Truman Smith, was, on his motion, referred to a select committee, and by him favorably reported on, and acted on by the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. That occurred during the Congress preceding the Thirty-Third.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I find that, in one particular, I was mistaken. I made the statement on the authority of a person whom I supposed was not in error. I find at the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress this entry:

"Agreeably to notice, Mr. HAMLIN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801; which was read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred, with the memorials on file, to the Committee on Foreign Relations."

Subsequently,

"On motion of Mr. HAMLIN,

"Ordered, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801."

So that it was done on motion of my colleague, and not on the motion of the chairman of the committee. I am now informed that, at a previous Congress, the same disposition was made of memorials on this subject. On motion of Mr. Smith, of Connecticut, who presented a memorial, the matter was referred to a select committee of this body. Of that I had no previous knowledge, as I had not investigated the matter. The last time the subject was under consideration here, it was withdrawn from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and referred to a select committee, who reported back the bill.

Now, sir, I suppose that properly, in the ordinary course of reference of subjects to committees of this body, this bill should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That is the most appropriate of all the standing committees; but there is an objection to it. It is proper, according to parliamentary usage, as a general rule, where it is asked for, as I understand, in a matter of considerable interest, that it should go to a committee which is not known or understood to be unfriendly to the whole object, and committed in relation to it. It so happens, with reference to the constitution of the committees of this body, that that is understood to be the case with reference to that committee, and not only with that committee, but also with some other committees, to which it might be proper, under ordinary circumstances, to refer this bill. It is a matter, also, of very great importance to the individuals interested, and therefore it would seem to be nothing more than right, inasmuch as this bill is one which has passed Congress on several occasions, that, at any rate, it should go to a committee from which we shall have some chance of having the bill reported back to the Senate. I believe it is always a sufficient reason for not sending a bill to a particular committee, that that committee is unfriendly to its object. I hope, therefore, that this bill, as it is perfectly well known a majority of the Senate (unless it has been very much changed in character by the additions recently made to it) are in favor of its general object, will have a chance to come into the Senate, and be acted upon on its merits.

I have only to add that, in case my motion be granted by the Senate, (and I believe it to be a reasonable one, even as addressed to gentlemen who may be opposed to the measure itself,) I trust I may be excused from serving on the committee. If the motion be carried, it might be considered, as a matter of course, that I should be one of them. I desire to be excused for the simple reason that I have that kind of personal interest in the subject-matter which would, in my judgment, render it improper that I should consider the subject.

Mr. MASON. Although the question involved in the motion of the honorable Senator from Maine affects, to a very great extent, private interests, or rather is based on the petition of private claimants for the payment of money alleged to be due to them, yet the questions on which these claims depend, as is well known to the Senate, are, it seems to me, proper questions to be considered by the standing committee of the Senate appropriate for them. The principal question, according to my recollection, is, whether war did or did not exist between the United States and France at a given time?—a question that seems to me peculiarly appropriate to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I express no opinion at all on the merits of the claim; but as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I thought it proper to state to the Senate what seemed to me to be the appropriate disposition of this, which is emphatically a public question, though private interests are involved. I felt it my duty, therefore, to move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SEWARD. I regret that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations thinks it his duty to claim that this subject properly belongs to that committee. I have heretofore had occasion to examine it with a very great deal of care, and to discuss it at some considerable length, and therefore it is not entirely a stranger to me. It is true that the subject involves an examination of treaties between the United States and France; but those treaties are seventy years past, and all the transactions out of which the claim arose are nearly sixty years old. All these transactions were closed about the year 1810.

These claimants are citizens of the United States, or their heirs or legal representatives. They claim from the Government of the United States payment for the losses which they sustained by French spoiliations, for which they say the Government of the United States received an indemnity from the Government of France in benefits secured by the treaty concluded in or about the year 1803. They received equivalents by the treaty of peace which was made in the year 1802 or 1803. It is, therefore, strictly a matter of claim, and not at all, as it seems to me, a matter requiring any action of the Committee on Foreign Relations. If I were to say to which of the standing committees of the Senate it would be most proper to refer it, I should say the Committee on Claims. I think this bill, which has been before the Congress of the United States nearly every year for fifty years, if I remember right, has at some stages been referred to the Committee on Finance. At all events, the strongest opposition which it has encountered came from the Committee on Finance; and the reason which seemed to move that committee was, that as the claim was a very large one, and threatened to draw a very considerable sum of money from the Treasury, it was proper to submit it as a financial question to that committee. Amongst other reasons which have been given by Presidents of the United States for vetoing the bill when it did pass Congress, was the reason that the finances of the Government were not then in a condition to make the payment at those times, and therefore I should think the Committee on Finance could more properly claim to consider this subject than the Committee on Foreign Relations.

But the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Claims have each of them business enough to transact which is of immense magnitude; and inasmuch as the whole question is one of great difficulty and great antiquity, as it has been debated here for fifty years, as it has been referred heretofore to select committees, as it is due that a candid, impartial consideration should be bestowed on the subject by Congress, I submit that it would be very right to send it to a committee who would not be expected to strangle it because they had already prejudged the case and formed an opinion against it. A select committee would be so constituted as to give the friends of the claim a majority on the committee, and I think that is according to practice and precedent. It is a great claim. It involves one of the most important questions which has been before the Government since its foundation, and it has been continually before it. It seems to me due to the importance of the subject, due to the venerable character of the claims, due to the great public authorities which have supported this claim, amongst others the late Mr. Webster, of Massachusetts, and I think Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Clay, the late John M. Clayton, and other very eminent statesmen. I do not say it would not obtain that consideration from the Committee on Foreign Relations. It certainly would on my part; but I think that, for the reasons I have stated, it is only just and liberal, and according to parliamentary precedent, to accede to the request made by the Senator from Maine, and give him a select committee on this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is very true that this has come to be a public question. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations so designates it, and for that reason he suggests that it should be committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations. There is no question that comes before us, when carefully criticised, that is not public to some extent. We legislate for no expenditure that does not involve the Treasury, and the Treasury affects the interests of our whole people.

If I am not wrong in my recollection, it would be more appropriate to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary than to the Committee on Foreign Relations at the present time, if it were not still more expedient to refer it to a select committee, as my colleague proposes. A bill was once passed to pay these claims, and it was vetoed by President Polk—a veto which, I confess, was never very satisfactory to my mind, as it was based upon the ground that we were at war with a foreign Government, and the sole reason alleged for that war was, that she had not liquidated the claims we held against her. He vetoed a bill to pay our own citizens, while we were at war with a foreign Government, because it was alleged that they would not pay us. That was the ground of the veto. A second time the bill was passed by Congress; and I believe I am right in saying that President Pierce predicated his veto on the ground that these claims were paid by some convention, subsequent to that period of time, between France and the United States. Then, if President Pierce was right in the view which he took in his veto message, the only practical question for us to determine is, was there ever a convention between the United States and France by which these claims were paid, or under which they were paid? That would be a legal question—a question which the Judiciary Committee of this body would and might more appropriately determine than the Committee on Foreign Relations.

But I affirm, sir, that this is a question which, while public in its character, is one affecting the rights of so many citizens individually, that they make no very particular claim when they come here and ask that it shall be referred to a committee which will insure at least a favorable report for the action of the Senate; and that it shall not at the outset be denied a hearing. That, too, has been the practice of this body twice, three times, and I think more. Indeed, I have never known a refusal to refer this measure to a select committee when that has been asked. I hope it may be granted on the present occasion; and for one other reason: we all know that all the standing committees of this Senate, at least the leading committees, are charged with important matters, which demand all their attention and all their time; and a select committee may bestow on this subject an appropriate consideration without encroaching upon the duties of the standing committees when those duties actually demand nearly all the time they have to spare. I hope the bill will be referred to a select committee.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope this bill will be referred to a select committee, because that seems to be the most appropriate for the purposes of investigation, so far as investigation is necessary. On various grounds it might be contended that it would be proper to refer the bill to a variety of committees. Being a claim for spoiliations committed on American commerce, it might well be said that it should go to the Committee on Commerce. I am very sure that when I first came into the Senate it was referred either to the Finance Committee or to the Committee on Commerce; and was reported to the Senate, and passed by this body, as coming from one of these committees—Mr. Bradbury, of Maine, being the gentleman who reported the bill. On that occasion it failed in the House of Representatives for want of time. Subsequently it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; but they were very soon discharged from its consideration, and it was referred to a select committee, who reported it to the Senate. On that occasion it passed both Houses, and was vetoed by the President of the United States. The history of this claim has been one of constant discussion for fifty years. Everything about it was supposed to be known till the veto of President Pierce on the last occasion on which it passed both Houses.

I cannot agree with the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] in his views as to the veto of President Polk. Perhaps I should have arrived at a different conclusion myself; but there was reason, in some measure, for the presidential veto in that case. The country being in a state of war with a foreign nation, taxing all her resources, it might be considered an improper time, in reference to the state of the Treasury and the general obligations of the country while carrying on that war, to act on claims of this kind. That I understood to be substantially President Polk's view of the case. It might well be that it was inexpedient at that time to relieve the claimants, whether the claim was just or not.

But, sir, the second veto of this measure introduces a new question—a question, it seems to me, purely of fact. I think the ground of that veto cannot be sustained on investigation. The allegation is that these claimants were actually paid by a convention between France and the United States.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have understood that President Pierce himself subsequently became satisfied that he was mistaken.

Mr. BAYARD. On investigation, I think it will be found that President Pierce was in error as to the main ground on which he vetoed this bill. All the other questions connected with it have been reported upon again and again by different committees composed of some of the ablest men who have ever sat in the two Houses. The subject has been exhausted on the other points.

I differ entirely from the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] as to the materiality of the fact whether this country was in a state of war at the time these spoiliations were committed. In my judgment, there was but a single question originally, apart from that which is raised as a mere matter of fact by President Pierce. The Government of the United States, having previously preferred claims on behalf of its citizens to the Government of France with other claims against France; and France, on her side, making claims against the Government of the United States on other grounds; in the settlement of these mutual claims the United States relinquished all right to make claim on behalf of its citizens to the Government of France. Having used these claims as a consideration for which to procure a relinquishment of the demands of the Government of France, (and whether those demands were valid or invalid is now immaterial,) it is not for this Government to say that the claims of its citizens were not valid as against France. In my judgment, in equity and in morals the Government of the United States is estopped from denying the validity of these claims as against France, when it presented and urged them on the French Government until it found it convenient for the general interests of the country to compromise them by getting rid of the French claims on us. This, in my belief, is the true ground on which the citizens of this country, who represent these claims, have a right to demand from their own Government that remuneration which they were authorized to claim from France, antecedent to her compromising the matter. Apart from that, comes the question which was raised by President Pierce. If it be true that these claims were adjusted and paid under a subsequent convention made with France, of course the claimants can have no relief; but I think it will be found, on investigation, that that idea is entirely illusory in fact.

Taking it in either view, there are various committees to which it might be contended the subject should be referred. Under these circumstances, it seems to me to be most appropriate that a select committee should have charge of it. There is a further ground stated by the honorable Senator from Maine, that almost all the standing committees to which it could be referred, have appropriate business of their own, sufficient to occupy their attention, and it is more proper that a subject of the magnitude in point of amount which is involved in this bill should go to a select committee. The Senate and House of Representatives have twice passed bills for the payment of this claim, as a legitimate charge on the Government, and each has been vetoed. My memory does not recall the number of times the measure has been passed by the Senate and House of Representatives separately. It is, however, quite sufficient, I think, to have settled the validity of the claim against the Government of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is first on the motion to refer the bill to the standing Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now on the motion to refer the bill to a select committee of seven members.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, the VICE PRESIDENT was authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. CRITTENDEN, COLLAMER, TOOMBS, HAMLIN, HUNTER, DAVIS, and KING, were appointed.

LEGAL TENDER.

Mr. SLIDELL, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 44) to amend an act entitled "An act amendatory of existing laws relative to the half dollar, dime, and half dime," approved February 21, 1853; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will very briefly state that the object of this bill is to extend the sum for which the silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender to twenty-five dollars. I have had some correspondence with the treasurer of the Mint on the subject, and he is satisfied that the operation of such a bill will be very beneficial in various ways. The objection may possibly be made that, for a sum so large as twenty-five dollars, it is imposing on the poorer classes of the community a depreciated currency; but I shall be enabled to satisfy the Senate that the actual cost of our silver coins now, at the present price of silver, including the charges for manufacture, makes their intrinsic value, as a manufactured article, at least equal to the current value.

Another motive that I have, and one which, I think, will meet the approbation of a large majority of the members of the Senate, is a desire to exclude, by the increased extension of this currency, the circulation of the smaller bank notes. I think that, by proper concerted action on the part of the Treasury and the different mints, a very large amount of silver could be put into circulation without any cost to the Government. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance; and I hope that committee will give its attention to the matter at an early day, and at any rate make a report favorable or unfavorable to the bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, which is the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to refer to the Committee on Territories so much of the President's message as relates to the Territory of Kansas.

Mr. DAVIS. My colleague, [Mr. BROWN], who commenced addressing the Senate yesterday, has sent me a note since the meeting of the Senate to-day, informing me that he is too unwell to proceed. In that connection he authorizes me to yield the floor to any Senator who may desire to occupy it; but, if no one desires to occupy it, then, as a matter of courtesy to my colleague, in order that his remarks may be continued from the point where they were arrested, I move to postpone the further consideration of the special order until Monday next.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will say Monday week. I do not see any practical good to result from this discussion.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let it go over to Monday. It is a matter of courtesy to the Senator from Mississippi that he should be allowed to finish his remarks on a day which is agreeable to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to postpone the further consideration of the special order until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDER J. ATOCHA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 28) for the relief of Alexander J. Atocha.

Mr. COLLAMER. I should like to hear the report in this case read.

Mr. MASON. I find, from the printed form, that one copy of the report is ascribed to me and the other to the late Senator from Maryland, Governor Pratt. The fact is that Governor Pratt made the report, and I entirely concurred in it.

The Secretary read the report, from which it appeared that Mr. Atocha was a citizen of the United States residing in Mexico, and, on the 26th of February, 1845, he received from that Government an order "to leave the city of Mexico within the period of eight days for Vera Cruz, in order to depart from the Republic."

It appears that he at the time protested, through Mr. Shannon, the American Minister, against this order, as a violation of the treaty of April 5, 1831, between the United States and Mexico, and notified the latter Government that he would hold it responsible for the losses he might sustain by reason thereof.

Forced by this order to retire from the Mexican territory within the period of eight days, he alleges that he sustained great pecuniary loss; and that he filed his claim specifying such loss, with the vouchers sustaining the same, before the board of commissioners appointed pursuant to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which he alleges was unjustly rejected by that board, and he therefore petitions Congress for redress.

Believing that it would be dangerous to go behind the decision of the commissioners, unless it should appear that they have erred in the law applied to the case, the committee examined the grounds assigned for an adverse decision, and became satisfied that the commissioners erred in the law upon which they predicated their decision.

The commissioners assume, in their opinion, that the loss of the memorialist, by reason of his expulsion from Mexico, is established by the evidence filed by him, and decide against the validity of his claim exclusively upon the assumption that the order of expulsion was legal and proper; because, as they assume, of the complicity of the memorialist with Santa Anna in his resistance to the Government de facto in their efforts to depose him as the President of the Republic.

The commissioners assume that the connection of the memorialist with the political movements of Santa Anna is established—first, by the fact that he remained there with Santa Anna until he was forced to abandon the Government and leave the Mexican territory; and, secondly, because Mr. Shannon, the American Minister, did not reply to a communication of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs of Mexico, in which that officer, in acknowledging the receipt of the protest of the memorialist against the order for his expulsion, says that Mr. Atocha "was one of the principal agents who wrought against the Government, as is notorious, and as his Excellency Mr. Shannon himself well knows."

The error of the first of these assumptions of fact by the commissioners is now established by the certificate of the officer having charge of the archives of the Mexican Government, which asserts that Mr. Atocha does not appear to have had any connection with the movements of Santa Anna; and by the letter of Santa Anna himself, who, on the part of Mexico, made the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, stating emphatically that Mr. Atocha never had any political connection with him, and that he remained with him by his invitation, because "in those times of disorder and insubordination, he could not separate himself from him without imminent risk."

The error of the second assumption of fact by the commissioners is established by the letter of our Minister, Mr. Shannon, in which he expresses the conviction that the memorialist was not in any manner connected with the political movements of Santa Anna, and that he did not reply to the communication of the Mexican Minister for Foreign Affairs, (not because he knew the correctness of his charge against Mr. Atocha,) but because the memorialist had left the country before the receipt of that communication.

But, for the purpose of the argument, assume, say the Committee on Foreign Relations, contrary to the fact, that the commissioners were right in saying that Mr. Atocha was connected with the political movements of Santa Anna, will it follow that the Government of Mexico was authorized to issue the order of expulsion against Atocha? The solution of this question will depend upon the construction of the treaty of 1831 between the United States and Mexico.

The twenty-sixth article of that treaty was intended to provide for the protection of the citizens of the two nations, in the event of war between them, and the stipulation is, "that if war should break out between the two contracting parties, there should be allowed the term of six months to the merchants residing on the coast, and one year to those residing in the interior of the States and Territories of each other, respectively, to arrange their business, dispose of their effects, or transport them wheresoever they may please, giving them a safe conduct to protect them to the port they may designate. Those citizens who may be established in the States and Territories aforesaid, exercising any other occupation or trade, shall be permitted to remain in the uninterrupted enjoyment of their liberty and property so long as they conduct themselves peaceably and do not commit any offense against the laws; and their goods and effects, of whatever class and condition they may be, shall not be subject to any embargo or sequestration whatever, nor to any charge or tax other than may be established upon similar goods and effects belonging to the citizens of the State in which they reside, respectively; nor shall the debts between individuals, nor moneys in the public funds, or in public or private banks, nor shares in companies be confiscated, embargoed, or detained."

During the late war with Mexico many citizens of the United States, who were residing as merchants in the territory of that Republic at the period when war was declared to exist between the two countries, were summarily expelled in disregard of this stipulation of the treaty of 1831, and most of the claims presented to and allowed by the board of commissioners appointed under the treaty of 1848 were for damages consequent upon such violation of the treaty of 1831.

The fourteenth article of the treaty of 1831 was designed to secure to the citizens of the two Republics, respectively, protection to their persons and property in time of peace; and, after stipulating for such protection, the two Governments contract and agree "that the citizens of either party shall enjoy, in every respect, the same immunities and privileges, either in prosecuting or defending their rights of person or of property, as the citizens of the country where the cause of action may be tried."

At the date of the order of expulsion of Mr. Atocha, Mexico and the United States were at peace with each other, and it necessarily follows, in the opinion of the committee, that for any offense with which he may have been charged, Mr. Atocha was entitled, under this article of the treaty, to be tried, and to have afforded to him all the means of a fair trial which are provided for in that article.

It seems to the committee to be clear that the Mexican Government, under this treaty stipulation, possessed no other or greater power to punish a citizen of the United States domiciled within her territory, than she possessed to punish one of her own citizens for a similar offense; and they are advised that the Mexican Government did not possess, under the constitution and laws of that Republic, the power to expel a Mexican citizen without trial for any offense. Indeed, the Minister for Foreign Affairs who issued the order of expulsion against Mr. Atocha, in response to the letter of the American Minister, which had inclosed the protest of Mr. Atocha against the legality of the order, and his notice of intention to claim damages for the losses which it would occasion him, says "that his Government is authorized, by the laws and constitution of the Republic, to expel from its limits non-naturalized foreigners pernicious to the country."

For the reasons assigned, the committee are of opinion that the expulsion of Mr. Atocha from the Mexican territory was a violation of the stipulations of the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1831; and, consequently, that he should have been awarded by the board of commissioners organized under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, such damages as he could show were sustained by him in consequence of that expulsion.

Of the $3,250,000 stipulated by the fifteenth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to be appropriated to the payment of claims of citizens of the United States against Mexico, the sum of about a quarter of a million of dollars still remains in the Treasury, and consequently to that extent the fund set apart for that purpose still exists to indemnify Mr. Atocha, if he can establish his claim by satisfactory proofs.

The committee have not deemed it their duty to investigate the quantum of indemnity to which Mr. Atocha may be entitled. As it is conceded that he was and is a citizen of the United States, they have confined themselves to the inquiry whether his claim was intended to be provided for by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; and the affirmative of this question is, in their opinion, clearly demonstrated by the papers and proofs in the case.

Among the papers filed by Mr. Atocha are the instructions of Santa Anna, then the President of the Republic of Mexico, to the Minister of his Government, charged with the negotiation of the treaty, directing him to have the name of Mr. Atocha inserted in the treaty as one whose claim was to be paid under its provisions; and there are repeated recognitions of its justice as against Mexico, from the obligations of which that Government claims to be released, solely because of the release by the United States, in that treaty, of all claims of its citizens against Mexico. Mr. Almonte, the accredited Minister of that Republic to this Government, was instructed to see that this claim, "the most just of any which had been presented," should be paid from the fund which Mexico had provided by the sale of a part of her territory for the liquidation of claims of citizens of the United States against her.

After the board of commissioners had closed their labors, many citizens of the United States, whose claims had been rejected, petitioned Congress to review the decision of that board; and the Senate of the United States did appoint a special committee, to sit during the recess of Congress, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to examine each case and report such as, in their judgment, were entitled to relief. That committee, in discharge of the duty assigned them, did investigate every claim which had been presented to the Senate for relief, and in every case, except this of Mr. Atocha, reported definitively. In his case no report was made because of an equal division of that committee upon his title to relief, so that this is the only case which has not received the supervision of the Senate.

Mr. SLIDELL. Mr. President, this bill was reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I think it proper to make a few remarks on the subject, inasmuch as I did not agree with the majority of the committee in that report; and I will state very briefly the reasons which governed me in not concurring.

In the first place, I considered that the action of the board of commissioners was in the nature of a judgment, and that unless some new testimony were offered which was not presented to the commissioners, their decision, or rather their failure to report in favor of Mr. Atocha, should stand.

The next objection that I had to the bill was to the form in which it is reported, which, according to my judgment, assumes the fact that Mr. Atocha was illegally expelled from Mexico, and that damages are due to him. On both these points I differ from the majority of the committee. I regret that my position on the committee obliges me to make this explanation, because there are personal relations existing between me and the petitioner, who has once been a constituent of mine, that would rather incline me to look favorably on his case.

Mr. Atocha was a citizen of the United States, resident in New Orleans for many years, and went to Mexico. He remained there for some ten or twelve years. His family was there. He of course did not lose his citizenship of the United States, but he certainly became a denizen of Mexico. He was very closely connected with the Government, and an intimate of Santa Anna. He was in Santa Anna's camp. When the power of Santa Anna was overthrown, Mr. Atocha was obliged to leave Mexico, his presence there being considered dangerous by the existing authorities. He claims not only ordinary damages for illegal expulsion, but, I understand, consequential damages for the loss of a lucrative business in which he was engaged as a broker, or something to that effect. It may be very possible, and I am inclined to believe, that Mr. Atocha has suffered some damage, for which, perhaps, it would have been right for the commissioners to make him some allowance. The amount of his claim I think grossly exaggerated. If I mistake not—my colleague can correct me if I err—it amounts to some $200,000.

One argument made use of in the committee was, that if the claim were allowed it would really cost the Government nothing; that there was a balance in the Treasury of $350,000, which, if it did not belong to Mr. Atocha, and other citizens of the United States protected by that article of the treaty, should revert to Mexico. That is not the view I take of the case. Under the treaty with Mexico we agreed to pay a certain sum—I forget how many millions of dollars; the amount is immaterial for the purposes of my argument—and $3,250,000 was to be reserved out of that fund to pay to that extent such damages as citizens of the United States might claim to have been inflicted on them by Mexico. It seems the whole amount was not expended; but this was a portion of the consideration: "We will take from you $3,250,000 in full compensation for all damages sustained by our citizens; and if the amount of damages proved exceed that sum, we will either assume the responsibility of paying it, or they must lose it." This sum is now in the Treasury, as emphatically a portion of the money of the people of the United States as money collected for duties. That argument, then, ought to have no weight.

Mr. Atocha's relations with Santa Anna were at least suspicious. He was in his camp, I think, as established by the report of the committee, which I have not read for some time; however, that is not material. I shall make no objection to the passage of this bill, though it cannot receive my concurrence, provided an amendment which I suggested to my colleague, who had the bill in charge heretofore, and to which he assented, be now adopted. The amendment is to this effect, to come in after the tenth line. I may as well read the whole bill, to explain the nature of my amendment:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, directed to examine into the claims of Alexander J. Atocha against the Government of Mexico, for losses sustained by him by reason of his expulsion from that Republic in 1845; and that the loss or damage so ascertained be paid to the said Alexander J. Atocha out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

It appears to me very evident from the language of this bill and the manner in which it is worded, that, in the first place, it is assumed that he is entitled to damages, no matter what the cause of his expulsion was, whether it was justifiable under the laws of nations, and under the particular circumstances of the country at the time, or not; and next, it assumes that loss or damage resulted from such expulsion, which should be paid to Mr. Atocha. I move to amend the bill, at the end of the tenth line, by inserting this proviso:

Provided, however, That said accounting officers shall inquire into the causes of said expulsion, and shall make no award in favor of said Atocha if, in their opinion, said expulsion was justifiable; nor shall any judgment be made under the provisions of this act without the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I am not willing to confide the discretion of disbursing $200,000 to subordinate accounting officers.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me this is evidently a case for the consideration of the Court of Claims; and I move that the bill and papers be referred to that court in order that it may be investigated on both sides. Let the petitioner appear before the court and present whatever arguments and evidence he can in favor of his claim, and let the United States be defended by its own officer. It seems to me from this statement to be a very suspicious claim, to say the least of it; but I do not care to prejudice its merits; I will not. All that I ask is that it be referred to the court which has been established for the consideration of such claims.

Mr. SLIDELL. I would suggest to the Senator from Virginia first to have the vote taken on the amendment which I have offered. I think it strips the bill of its most objectionable features.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia withdraw his motion?

Mr. HUNTER. I will withdraw it at the request of the Senator from Louisiana; but I will renew it after his amendment shall have been disposed of.

Mr. MASON. This claim was before the Committee on Foreign Relations during the last session, and was very closely and diligently examined by that committee. A report was made on it by an honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Pratt,] who is no longer a member of this body; but I participated with him in the examination of the papers, and I believe I read them every one.

This gentleman, Mr. Atocha, was a citizen of the United States residing for the time in Mexico, for some years before the late war with Mexico. Before the war broke out, or rather before the war was declared, he was expelled violently by the existing Government of Mexico, which at that time was a Government de facto rather than a Government de jure. The order of expulsion was, that he should leave the city of Mexico within eight days. He made every effort through our Minister, who was then resident in Mexico, and through such other sources as were open to him, to be permitted to remain long enough to adjust his affairs, and to enable him to bring off some portion of his property; but the mandate of the Mexican Executive was peremptory; he was not listened to, but was forced to leave the country on that short notice. He had been long resident in Mexico. He is, I think, (indeed I am pretty sure, for I believe that appears from the papers,) a naturalized citizen of the United States, of Spanish birth. He spoke the Spanish well, was conversant with all Mexican affairs, and was employed by our Government in confidential relations during the war in Mexico. He was sent by our Government to Mexico as an agent in the course of the war, and a very just and proper tribute was paid to him by the then Secretary of State—now the President of the United States—because of the faithful and important services which he rendered to his adopted country, and without compensation.

That history, perhaps, led me to look more closely into his case than I might have done into the case of an ordinary claimant, and, as I have said, really from a desire to see that justice was done to one who was certainly a meritorious citizen, I believe I read every paper in a very voluminous mass that was before the committee. The grounds on which the committee made their report are very lucidly, although succinctly, stated in the report made by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Pratt,] in which I, to some extent, participated, although it is truly his report. They were, in substance, these: This gentleman was residing in Mexico as a banker and broker, and carrying on large money transactions in that country. It seems that he had money transactions with the existing Government, the Government of Santa Anna, which was overthrown by that power which expelled him; and because of a supposed connection between Atocha and the Government of Mexico in the hands of Santa Anna, this violent order of expulsion was made. He was remitted in due time to the board who sat here to decide upon claims that were embraced within the treaty of peace, and his claim was rejected by that board. I agreed at once with the honorable Senator who made the report, and with the majority of the committee, that it would be a very dangerous thing to go behind the action of the board, and to determine that the commissioners had been wrong, and that this claim ought to be allowed; but the Senate will find in looking at the report which is made in the case, that the committee have not found it necessary to do so, and, therefore, have not done it. The report rests entirely on the ground that the board of commissioners erred, and it struck me erred very greatly in their construction of the law under which they were acting.

We did not attempt in the report to decide on the facts; but we found there a subject which had not entered at all (for we had the report of the board of commissioners) into their deliberations; that, by the existing treaty between the United States and Mexico, when the war broke out between the two countries, a citizen of the United States residing in Mexico, or a Mexican residing in the United States, was entitled to a period of six months to wind up his affairs under the direction of the Government, before he should be required to leave the country. That was not only denied to Mr. Atocha, but with all his affairs open, everything unsettled, and covering, as the papers show, a vast number of important pecuniary transactions, not with the Government alone but with the business interests of Mexico, he was expelled in that summary and violent manner, without a hearing, and without being allowed to remain even long enough to sell the furniture in his house.

Mr. COLLAMER. Allow me to ask a question. I understand this was before the declaration of war. The provision of the treaty was, that in case of war, six months should be allowed; but it seems this was before the war.

Mr. MASON. I said it was before the war was declared, but war existed. Blood had been shed and war existed before there was a formal declaration of war by the United States. It was a very peculiar declaration of war. I dare say the Senator has some recollection of the peculiar features attending that declaration.

Mr. COLLAMER. But was not this before any difficulty about that war with us?

Mr. MASON. No, sir; very far from it. The papers show that Santa Anna was in undisputed possession of the Government and had been for some years. He had retired to his plantation for a recess of a month or two, and during his absence there came one of those pronunciamientos in the capital which declared him out of power, and his successor in power—I have forgotten the name of his successor. It was because of the hostile relations that the Mexican people believed existed between the United States and the Government of Mexico that this American citizen, supposed to be allied with Santa Anna, was expelled. The committee found that the Senate had already set the precedent, as is recited in the report, in the case of two or three citizens of the United States.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senator will excuse me for interrupting him. The report says this man fled from there in February, 1845. We had no symptoms of war until 1846. I merely mention this to show that this claim could not have come under the article of the treaty which has been alluded to.

Mr. MASON. To what treaty does the Senator refer.

Mr. COLLAMER. The treaty between us and Mexico; which provided that, in case of war with this country, citizens should have six months to leave.

Mr. MASON. When was that treaty made? Mr. COLLAMER. I think in 1831. This man was expelled before there was any state of war at all with us.

Mr. MASON. That depends entirely on what the Senator's idea of a state of war is. I said just now, that when it assumed the form of a declaration of war, it was rather a recognition of an existing war than a declaration of war. It was a recognition that war existed between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. COLLAMER. That was in 1846.

Mr. MASON. Very well. An examination of the papers shows, that as soon as that revolutionary government got possession in Mexico, they assumed, although war had not been declared either to exist, or recognized as existing, that such were the hostile relations between the two countries as to make it prudent and wise on their part to expel this American citizen. It was a quasi war, if you will, but the relations which they believed existed were of a character which required them, for their safety, to expel this American citizen because he was an American citizen.

I was going on to say that the Senate had set the precedent in reference to the adjudications of the board of commissioners, by a law raising a committee, to whom were to be referred certain claims, which had been rejected by that board, and amongst them that of Mr. Atocha, and there was no report made in his case, because the committee, one member being absent, was equally divided. If we look at the equity and the merits of the case, it does seem to me that it forms a very strong ground of claim on the part of this gentleman, who rendered meritorious service to the country, although under that disastrous fortune; not against the United States, for that is not pretended; but a claim against this fund, which is not yet exhausted, out of which these claims were to be paid.

The bill provides that it shall be paid, provided there remains a balance unexpended of the money reserved by the treaty for the purpose of paying that character of claims; and that I would give as an answer to the suggestion of my honorable colleague, that it is not a case for the Court of Claims at all. It is not a claim against the United States. The law raising the Court of Claims, as far as I can recollect, provides that there shall be referred to it all claims against the United States. This is a claim against the Government of Mexico, with which the United States would have nothing to do, except that, by the treaty with Mexico, a fund was reserved by the United States for the purpose of paying claims of her citizens against Mexico; and that fund we have been informed—I do not remember its amount—has not yet been exhausted. There is a balance of it in the Treasury which can be applied to the payment of this claim, if the bill passes, a part of which has already been applied by law of the two Houses in payment of those claims I have spoken of, that had been referred to a select committee. They were paid out of that fund, and the balance—I do not know how much it is, I dare say not enough to pay the whole of this claim—remains there unexpended.

Now, in reference to the character of that fund, I understand the honorable Senator from Louisiana to say that whatever remains unexpended of that treaty fund in the Treasury, is the property of the United States. I should take issue with him directly. The treaty with Mexico provided that there should be paid to Mexico a certain sum of money, I think, $15,000,000; of which $15,000,000, $3,250,000 should be reserved by the United States for the purpose of paying claims by citizens of the United States against Mexico. The treaty provided for a sum, in gross, to be paid to Mexico, on the termination of the war, for certain equivalents in land, of which, by agreement between the two countries, $3,250,000 were set apart for the purpose of paying claims of American citizens against the Government of Mexico. I should say, therefore, that if it should turn out that there does remain a balance of that reserved fund not required to pay these claims, it is the undoubted property of Mexico, and not the property of this country, and it ought to be paid over to her. That is the condition of the fund as I understand it, and as it was understood by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I will not go into the merits of the case, because perhaps it might not be expedient that we should attempt to revise the judgment of the board of commissioners on the facts; but the bill provides that the accounting officers shall examine whether anything is due, and, if so, pay what is due, provided it shall not exceed the balance of the fund.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to say a single word on this matter, as I have been appealed to by my colleague. I had not, as my colleague supposes, charge of this bill, but I took an interest in the memorialist, and in examining his claim, because he was one of my constituents. I examined it in connection with our late colleague from Maryland, who has recently left the Senate, very carefully at home. But it appears to me that those who desire to have this matter referred to the Court of Claims are not aware of the precise state of the facts. The report of the Committee on Foreign Relations establishes that this claimant made good this claim, by proof, before the commission which was formed after the last treaty of peace with Mexico, for the purpose of determining the justice of these claims. He established his claim by proof. The commission declined to allow the payment, upon the ground that he had been properly expelled from Mexico, as having interfered in the internal convulsions of that country in the strife for power of the different factions which are constantly raging there. They assumed this upon two grounds; first, because it was proven, that between the date of the order of expulsion and his actual departure from the country, he resided with Santa Anna; and secondly, upon the ground that a communication was made by the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations, to our diplomatic agent there, asserting the fact that this claimant had been engaged in those political intrigues, to which letter of the Mexican Minister, it was said, our diplomatic agent had made no answer.

When the case came up for trial, and these proofs were offered against the claimant, they took him by surprise. They took him by surprise for the reason that it was utterly impossible for him to imagine that a correspondence of this kind had taken place; and it was not until the case was decided against him on this ground that he went into an investigation of a correspondence which it was asserted had taken place, and compromised his entire right. He went in search of the gentleman who was our minister at the time of the correspondence, Mr. Shannon, and inquired from Mr. Shannon, "How came it, sir, that you, who, as the representative of my country, defended my interests, received such a letter as this from the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations, and left it unreplyed to?" The answer was prompt and decisive, "It occurred because the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations did not reply to my remonstrance in your behalf until he had sent you out of the country, and it was then useless to continue a correspondence on the subject of the order." Our minister protested against his silence being construed into an acquiescence in the statements made by the Mexican diplomatist, and no inference, therefore, can fairly be drawn against this claimant.

In relation to the single fact, that for eight or ten days he lived in the house of Santa Anna, he produced the proofs that the country was then in a convulsed state, that his personal safety was endangered, and brought before the Committee on Foreign Relations a letter from Santa Anna, then the President of the Republic, asserting that this claimant never had had any political relations whatever with him, and that he had sought refuge in his house against danger to his person.

Everything else but that particular point was decided by the Mexican commission in favor of the claimant. There remains nothing, therefore, for consideration now except the amount of the claim, and that amount, under the terms of the bill, is to be reexamined, although already once examined, and decided in favor of the claimant, by the officers of the Treasury Department, and no amount is to be paid over except such as the auditor shall find just; and, according to the amendment of my colleague—to which I can offer no opposition—until that decision, so to be made by the auditor, is affirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury. There is nothing for the Court of Claims to act upon. This matter has already been decided contradictorily by the Government; the solitary point on which the claimant found his demand rejected, being that he was engaged in those political intrigues—that point assumed against him by surprise—that particular fact now thoroughly disproven, nothing remaining but an examination into the amount to which he is justly entitled.

I trust, under the circumstances of the case, that this claimant, who has been here ten or twelve years seeking for justice, will not now be turned over to the Court of Claims, where, establishing his case, he will again be brought before Congress for the purpose of having that measure of relief passed in his favor which it is now entirely in our power to grant. I hope the Senate will pass this bill, and trust so far to the officers of the Treasury that they will make a scrupulous examinations of the items of the claim, and allow no more than is just and proper.

Mr. HUNTER. According to the rules of the Senate, it is provided that:

"Whenever a private bill is under consideration, it shall be in order to move, as a substitute for it, a resolution of the Senate, referring the case to the Court of Claims."

In regard to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, if my colleague will look to the law establishing the court, he will find it has most complete jurisdiction. I offer this resolution as a substitute for the bill:

Resolved, That the bill (S. No. 28) for the relief of Alexander J. Atocha, together with the report from the Committee on Foreign Relations and the papers relating to the case, be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I object to the consideration of the resolution, as out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The language of the rule is peculiar; but the Chair is of opinion that the resolution is in order now. He does not think it falls within that class of resolutions which must lie over if objected to. It is in the nature of a motion as a substitute.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. My objection is not on that point. We are considering the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, and the question is whether another Senator can interrupt that question by offering a resolution. I do not object to the consideration of the resolution because it is just offered. I object to it, because it is out of time and supersedes business, contrary to the rule. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana. Before we have taken a vote on that subject, this resolution is offered. Is that in order? I think not.

Mr. HUNTER. This motion is made under the 29th rule, which rule is designed to provide, as I understand, for just such cases. Before we consider the merits of the bill let us decide whether or not we shall refer it to another tribunal, where it can be more properly examined and adjudicated.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I submit still that that does not authorize this resolution now. After the amendment shall have been disposed of, it may be in order; but it is very extraordinary to me that a Senator can rise in the midst of a debate on a pending amendment, and supersede it by a resolution. He must be in order to make such a motion; and he is not in order to make such a motion while an amendment is pending. That is my judgment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will give his impression on the point of order. The 29th rule provides that "whenever a private bill is under consideration, it shall be in order to move, as a substitute for it, a resolution of the Senate referring the case to the Court of Claims." The bill was under consideration, and the immediate question was on an amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana. The Senator from Virginia, being regularly entitled to the floor, has made this motion in the nature of a resolution. The Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Then I hope it will not be adopted. We have already devoted some time to this bill, and I think it would be unjust to refer it now. It has been long delayed, too long if the claimant is entitled to relief. It may be that the Court of Claims may not feel at liberty to exercise the discretion which we may desire. It may be that this gentleman, though he may have a just claim, will be found not to have a claim which the court can recognize according to the laws which regulate its proceedings. It is an appeal, to some extent, to the justice and discretion of Congress. We deprive him entirely of that appeal if we refer him to a tribunal of law, which may say to him—"Your claim is just, but we have not authority to allow it; your claim is not of that legal and sanctioned character which we can alone consider; we cannot consider claims that have no legal sanction against the United States." We might find that the court would turn the party back to Congress with just such a decision as the commissioners under the treaty made. I hope the case will not be referred now, but that we shall be able to consummate the matter in a short time.

Mr. HUNTER. When the Senator from Kentucky interrupted me, I was about to state there could be no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims. The act establishing the court provides:

"The said court shall hear and determine all claims founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, which may be suggested to it by a petition filed therein; and also all claims which may be referred to said court by either House of Congress."

There can be no doubt, therefore, of the jurisdiction of the court, if this claim should be referred to it. From the statements that have been made on both sides, it seems to me that this is eminently a case for the consideration of the Court of Claims. There is a dispute as to the precise obligation of the United States towards this claimant, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo—under previous treaties, and under the law of nations. I can conceive of no case which is more suited to be referred to the adjudication of the Court of Claims than the one we are now considering. If we do not refer it to them, there are many points suggested by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] which we shall have to consider before we act on the bill. It was designed by the institution of this court to save Congress all that sort of trouble. It was supposed that it would be a much better tribunal for the examination of all such cases than Congress; and under this supposition I propose now that this case shall go to that court for its examination and decision.

Mr. MASON. Although I do not mean to say that my colleague may not be right in his construction of the law, I cannot agree with him that his construction necessarily follows from its language. The law says:

"The said court shall hear and determine all claims founded upon any law of Congress"

These would, of course, be claims against this Government. A law of Congress cannot affect the interests of any people but our own, and I think I may safely infer that claims of this class would be claims against this Government—

"or upon any regulation of an executive department?"

I think I may safely infer that this class would include only claims against this Government—

"or upon any contract express or implied with the Government of the United States?"

necessarily embracing only claims against this Government—

"which may be suggested to it by a petition filed therein; and also all claims which may be referred to said court by either House of Congress."

What I meant to say was, that it was the very essence and spirit of this law to provide a court for the adjudication of claims against this Government. I should think it was not contemplated to refer to the court any claim except a claim against this Government, although it may be that under the general terms of the last clause, making it competent for Congress to refer any claim if they think it expedient or wise, they may do so. The general language employed would seem to import that if Congress refer a claim to the court that fact gives jurisdiction, because Congress so wills. I should doubt, however, whether it would be proper and in conformity to the purpose of the law to refer to the court any claim but such as is strictly a claim against the Government of the United States.

But, sir, there is this objection to referring this claim merely as the voluntary act of Congress; if the claimant is referred to the Court of Claims he will have to go back to Mexico and take his proofs de novo. After having been actually stripped, as I am satisfied he has been, of all the property he possessed by this lawless act of Mexican power, and after having, as the honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENTLEY] has well said, established his claim by proofs taken in conformity with the regulations established by a tribunal before which both sides, debtor and creditor, were heard, he is now to be required to go back and take his proofs de novo, when I dare say it is utterly out of his power on account of the lapse of time, even if he had the means to effect it. Even if the Senate should consider it as a matter within their discretion, to refer the case to the Court of Claims, I hope it will not be so referred.

Mr. SEWARD. The object of establishing the Court of Claims, as I understand it, is to facilitate the investigation and payment of just claims against the Government of the United States, but it is not its object to postpone or delay the payment of such claims. There is a discretion exercised by Congress in referring claims to that court. That discretion is wisely exercised when the facts are unknown or the law applicable to the case is uncertain; but all these difficulties seem to have been surpassed in this case. In the first place, the fund already exists and stands waiting for the payment of this claim, if the claim itself shall be allowed. In the second place, the facts have been established before a tribunal as competent to inquire into and report upon them as the Court of Claims; and, in the third place, the law in the case has been examined by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I should certainly be unwilling to admit that the Court of Claims is better competent to pass, and has more impartiality, or more learning, or ability to settle what are the principles of law applicable to this case, than this committee of our own body. That committee seems to have examined the subject, and so there remains nothing but to ascertain the amount which shall be paid, and we have officers in the Treasury Department for that purpose. The Court of Claims can have no capacity to perform that duty better than the officers to whom this will be referred. Under the circumstances, it seems to me we can only refer this claim to the court on the principle of desiring to delay and embarrass and procrastinate so as to harass the suitor. If the claim is right or just, I think it ought to be passed at once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know nothing about this claim, except from hearing the report read; and that, as any one will perceive, gives a member of the Senate very little opportunity to judge of the merits of a claim of this description. I have nothing to say against it. I think it likely that it may be all right; but I differ with my honorable friend from New York in his notions about the propriety of referring claims of this description to the Court of Claims. It is a very large amount, in the first place, and will therefore justify the claimant in prosecuting his claim before the tribunal which we have established for such purposes. I think there is only one class of cases in which we should omit to send a claim against the Government to the Court of Claims, where it is proper, from its nature and character, that it should go there; and that is, that somewhat numerous class where the claims are so small that sending them to the Court of Claims is equivalent to a denial of justice altogether; where the expenses will necessarily be such as, if successful, the complainants, or the people who have claims against the Government, will in reality get nothing.

Here is a claim, amounting, I understand, to some two or three hundred thousand dollars. It has already been once rejected by the board before which it was brought, which was constituted for the purpose of examining claims against Mexico. It has, I understand, been once before a select committee of this body, and rejected. It now comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have as much confidence in the Committee on Foreign Relations as I have in any committee of this body; and it is sufficient to say that, in all these private matters, I believe they endeavor to do what is right; but every man knows, or ought to know, that it is impossible to try a claim, especially a claim of a large amount, involving transactions of a serious and complicated nature, on ex parte testimony before a committee of this body. That was established as a fact when the Court of Claims was constituted. If it had not been the conviction of the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives, that it was unjust to the Government, and that the Government suffered by the very fact that these claims were presented to committees of this description and were heard on ex parte testimony, we should never have established the Court of Claims; there would have been no necessity for it. We did it for the very reason that we were convinced that in the nature of things it was not possible to have these claims investigated, as they should be investigated, properly, and arrive at correct results, by sending them to committees. That was the great argument used.

Now, I hold that in all cases where the claim is so large that it will justify a pursuit before the Court of Claims; when, in fact, sending it there is not substantially a denial of justice, we ought, if we think anything of our own acts here, to send it there. If there is any good reason for establishing the Court of Claims at all, all such claims as are proper for their consideration, and come within the meaning or language of the statute, ought to go there. To use a common expression, we ought not to make fish of one and flesh of another, but should put these claims against the Government on one level. We have established a tribunal in such a form that the interests of the Government can be regarded. We have appointed a solicitor to look after the interests of the Government, and a court to hear the cases. Certainly no one can say, from the experience we have had, that that court is too anxious to look out for the interests of the Government at the expense of the claimants. I think some claims have come here from the Court of Claims of very questionable character, and where the decisions at least did not meet my approbation.

Under these circumstances, when there is nothing but an ex parte hearing, when there have been reports against this claim on two several occasions, first by the board of commissioners, and next by the select committee, which might be presumed to examine it with as much care as if it had a great deal of other business before it, I see no reason why we should break over the rules we have established in reference to our own act, overthrow substantially our court, and give this man, having a large claim, a privilege we give nobody else; but we should send him to the court we have established for the purpose of deciding claims.

Mr. TOOMBS. There are many public reasons, apart from the claim itself why the course proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] should be pursued on this occasion. This claim is founded on a treaty obligation. It is a claim originally against the Government of Mexico for damages for the expulsion of the claimant. By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, we assumed to pay claims of our citizens against Mexico to the extent of three and a quarter million dollars, and we created a tribunal to determine the claims. The claimant was before that tribunal, and its decision was against him. It is now affirmed by the Committee on Foreign Relations that this decision was founded upon a mistake of facts, or rather that he has subsequently procured testimony showing that the state of facts on which the board acted was incorrect. That is the present position of the case, and I am called upon to determine that question.

I say it is eminently proper that it should be determined by the tribunal created for the purpose, and not by me, for the reasons that have been so well given by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] The evidence before us is ex parte; we do not know that it is correct. Our committees have no means of taking correct testimony, particularly in a case where the greater part of the evidence comes from the city of Mexico. We do not know whether the papers before the committee were genuine or not. When this party has had a fair trial before a tribunal appointed by the highest authorities, and his claim has been rejected, it is going very far to allow him to appear before another tribunal. To grant this, in order to admit after-discovered evidence, is greatly in ease and favor of this claimant; but to go on and determine the case on the idea that we must facilitate and hasten his payment, as urged by the Senator from New York, is, I think, utterly erroneous.

Besides, if we go on in this way, we shall destroy all the benefits which the public service was to receive from the reference of claims to a court. The Court of Claims was established, not merely to facilitate the payment of claimants, but to get at the facts of each case, by presenting them to a tribunal having time to examine the principles, and thus relieve the legislation of the country. Formerly, we gave about one fourth of our time to private claims, and it was impossible for us to do justice. Now, a worse system will be inaugurated, if you allow favored claims, properly falling within the jurisdiction of the court, to be taken from it on account of some peculiar solicitation, or for some special reason. I would refer to the court all cases coming within its jurisdiction, without distinction. I think the Senate ought to make a stand here. If a claim is within the scope of the jurisdiction of the court, that fact ought to be sufficient of itself to insure its reference, and I know of no reason which can override it. Pursue any other course, and you will have a system of favoritism. If one committee reports against a claim, the parties interested will hunt up a committee that is favorable. I speak of what every man knows to be a common usage.

Nobody ever came before Congress that did not get a favorable report from some committee. An examination of the records will show that claims which have been rejected twice, thrice, even fifty times, have finally been favorably reported upon.

Now, sir, we have a judicial tribunal for which we pay a great sum of money, more capable than we are, and having more time than we have, to decide questions of this sort. It ought to be an inflexible rule with this body, whenever a claim is within the jurisdiction of that court, to refer it to them; and therefore I approve the resolution of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to add a few words to the remarks of the two gentlemen who have preceded me. This Mr. Atocha, as appears by the report, was sent out of Mexico by the executive Government of that country; but this was not on account of any difficulty between Mexico and the United States, because it was a year before the war, or anything like quasi war, existed. The report quotes an article in a former treaty with Mexico, providing that our citizens should, in the event of a war, have six months' notice to leave the country. This does not apply to Mr. Atocha's case, because there was not a state of war at that time, and he was not sent out of the country as being offensive in consequence of any difficulty arising from his being an American citizen.

The fourteenth article of the old treaty provided that our citizens residing in Mexico should have all the rights which Mexican citizens had in relation to legal trials. Mr. Atocha was sent out of the country in a time of peace; and if there is any objection to his being sent out by the executive Government as an American citizen, it is because of that fourteenth article. That brings us directly to this question: had they a right, under their laws and by their Constitution, to send out of the country at once a person whom they regarded as a dangerous citizen? If they had, they had a right to send Mr. Atocha out, and there is no claim at all. He had no more right there than a Mexican citizen. They sent him away as being a dangerous or offensive inhabitant. If they had the power and right, under their constitution, to send away one of their own people, they had a right to send this man away. The whole question would seem, then, to turn on this: had they a right to send away one of their own citizens? I do not know that they had not. It is said that it was done by people who had, by a sort of pronunciamiento, put out Santa Anna. I suppose Santa Anna would have had the same right while he exercised the Government, if the right existed at all.

Mr. SLIDELL. There was a state of siege at the time; martial law prevailed.

Mr. COLLAMER. The actual existing Government in the hands of the then Executive exercised this power, which I suppose is common to Mexico, and, for aught I know, constitutional. If so, it is Mr. Atocha's misfortune, and his claim must be against somebody else. He cannot have a claim against us, or even against Mexico, if he was dealt with by the existing authorities of the country according to law. That is a question which depends entirely on the extent of the constitution and laws of Mexico—I am not prepared to say. I do not know but that the Court of Claims may properly look into that, and say there was no right to expel him in the manner in which it was done. That, however, is presuming that Mexico is a free, just, and liberal country, like ours, and that therefore no such power can exist there. Such a power does exist in many countries, and is considered necessary for their safety.

Mr. SLIDELL. A single word in answer to an argument of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I asserted that this money absolutely belonged to the United States; that no argument could be adduced from the fact of there being a balance remaining of the $3,250,000. By the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico we paid $15,000,000 for the extension of boundaries. By the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth articles, we incurred the following obligations:

"ART. 13. The United States engage, moreover, to assume and pay to the claimants all the amounts now due them, and those hereafter to become due, by reason of the claims already liquidated and decided against the Mexican Republic, under the conventions between the two Republics, severally concluded on the 11th day of April, 1839, and on the 30th day of January, 1843; so that the Mexican Republic shall be absolutely exempt, for the future, from all expense whatever on account of the said claims.

"ART. 14. The United States do furthermore discharge the Mexican Republic from all claims of citizens of the United States, not heretofore decided against the Mexican Government, which may have arisen previously to the date of the signature of this treaty; which discharge shall be final and perpetual, whether the said claims be rejected or be allowed by the board of commissioners provided for in the following article, and whatever shall be the total amount of those allowed.

"ART. 15. The United States, exonerating Mexico from all demands on account of the claims of their citizens mentioned in the preceding article, and considering them entirely and forever canceled, whatever their amount may be, undertake to make satisfaction for the same, to an amount not exceeding $3,250,000."

The treaty then goes on to say that all these claims shall be ascertained and passed upon by the board of commissioners; and this Government agree to pay no claims which are not recognized as valid against the Government of Mexico by the board of commissioners. This is not a recognition of the sum of $3,250,000 being due to Mexico, out of which we should have a right to retain, under certain circumstances, a portion in order to indemnify our own citizens; but it is an absolute obligation on our part to pay to our own citizens $3,250,000, under certain circumstances, when they have established certain proofs. I think there can be no doubt of this.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. My friend from Vermont assumes that this expulsion of Atocha took place before the war. I think it is a matter of some little question when the war may be said to have commenced. There was no formal declaration of war at any time by Mexico against this country, or by this country against Mexico, unless Mexico can be considered as having made a conditional declaration of war when, before the annexation of Texas to this country, she made a solemn declaration that she would make war if Texas was admitted. Texas was admitted, as well as I remember, in the early part of the year 1845. The event then took place on which the conditional declaration of war by Mexico took effect. From that time, then, we should have had a right, if we pleased, to consider that there existed a state of war. Blows were first struck in the spring of 1846, but the declaration of war, if there was any, was that which I have supposed—a conditional declaration of war by Mexico previous to the admission of Texas; and all the interval between the striking of blows and the annexation of Texas was a state on both sides, particularly on the side of Mexico, of preparation to strike the blow. From her extensive dominions she was marching troops to the Rio Grande; and as soon as she got ready a sufficient force there, she crossed that boundary, and a battle was fought. Now, are we to say that the war commenced only from the time when these blows were struck? If anything justified her in making that war, it was her previous declaration to us that she would make it if we annexed Texas. It seems to me, then, that although the expulsion of Mr. Atocha occurred previous to the first battle, it may have been at a time when there was a state of virtual war existing by the only declaration of war that was made by either party. I think, then, the case is not clear against the claimant on this point.

While I admit the propriety of the general doctrine urged by gentlemen, it seems to me that there are peculiar circumstances in this case which will justify us in now deciding on the claim without referring it to the Court of Claims. A long time has elapsed since the claim was first presented. A portion of it has been occupied in a vain struggle before a tribunal erected by Congress for disposing of the fund reserved to pay private claims against Mexico. In that the party failed. Since then, he has been long collecting such testimony as was appropriate enough before this tribunal. Now you say turn him back and let him go before the court. The remarks which have been made on this subject are generally judicious; but here is a transaction occurring in a foreign country connected with the politics of that country, and, after this lapse of time, it is exceedingly improbable whether the testimony to support this claim can be produced in that precise form which the rules of evidence will demand when it goes before this tribunal. Evidence of a character that would be very satisfactory to us, could not be admitted there, not because it would be disbelieved by the tribunal, but because it was not in that formal and authentic form which alone can render it admissible in a court of justice. I think, therefore, we should not violate our duty to our country, we should not set a bad example, by now acting and deciding ourselves on this claim. It is one in which I have no peculiar interest, only the desire that justice may be done, and that promptly. I think, sir, the nation will lose but little security in transferring from that court to the accounting officers of the Government this claim, and requiring their decision upon it to be sanctioned by the Secretary of the Treasury. The public interest seems to me to be sufficiently guarded, as well almost as it would be by a reference to the court. Under these circumstances, and the case being ready for decision before us, I see no reason why we should interpose this obstacle to a present decision on this subject, and let the party receive whatever he is entitled to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution to refer this case to the Court of Claims.

Mr. SLIDELL. I wish to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which will govern my vote in this case. If the amendment which I have offered is accepted, I shall be willing to send the claim to the accounting officers of the Treasury. If it is not accepted, I shall vote for its reference to the Court of Claims.

Mr. MASON. I see no particular objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, and I would accept it; but I cannot see how he is to effect the object, unless my colleague withdraws the resolution until the bill is perfected; and then we can have a test vote on the reference to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HUNTER. My view in submitting the motion was to carry out one of the objects of the establishment of the Court of Claims, to save the Senate the trouble, and refer the subject to the court, as a body better calculated to do justice in the case than we can be, with our imperfect means of examining testimony. I therefore desire to take the sense of the Senate whether they will refer the subject entirely to the decision of the Court of Claims, or will decide on it themselves. If it be thought to be a case for the Court of Claims, we can save ourselves the trouble of considering all these amendments, and the merits of the bill. I must, therefore, persist in my motion, and ask that the sense of the Senate be taken on it.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays on the motion to refer the bill to the Court of Claims; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bigler, Broderick, Chandler, Colamer, Davis, Doolittle, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Green, Hamlin, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pearce, Pugh, Sebastian, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Cameron, Clay, Crittenden, Dixon, Gwin, Hale, Houston, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Seward, and Thomson of New Jersey—15.

So the bill was referred to the Court of Claims.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Secretary.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 5, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. D. BALL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COURT OF CLAIMS BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the condition of the bills from the Court of Claims which were not finally disposed of at the last session of Congress. The law passed in 1855 requires that the reports from the Court of Claims shall be taken up and disposed of the same as if there had been no adjournment. In construing that law, the Chair has felt himself constrained to hold that where a bill had received its first and second reading at a preceding Congress, it would be incompetent to resume the consideration of that bill at the point where it had been left off. He has, therefore, held that it is necessary that these bills shall be resumed, and the proceedings commenced de novo. He has given instructions to the Clerk, in making up the Calendar, not to place any of these bills upon it; and if the House concurs with the Chair in the views he has taken, it will proceed to have all the bills undisposed of at the last Congress read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims, so that they can be taken up in conformity to law. The adverse reports the Chair has directed to be placed upon the Calendar. If, therefore, there be no objection, the Chair will present these bills for a first and second reading.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. If the law be such as it has been stated by the Speaker, I should be glad to have it read before the House acquiesces in the present ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The law provides—"That said reports, and the bills reported as aforesaid, shall, if not finally acted upon during the session of Congress to which the said reports are made, be continued from session to session, and from Congress to Congress, until the same shall be finally acted upon; and the consideration of said reports and bills shall, at the subsequent session of Congress, be resumed, and the said reports and bills be proceeded with, in the same manner as though finally acted upon at the session when presented."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not think that there can be any doubt of the correctness of the views presented by the Speaker in the decision he has just made with regard to these bills. The action of the last Congress upon these bills was inchoate, unfinished, and they stand now just as other bills do, which, passing one House, have not passed the other, from whatever cause, or as bills do which have passed both Houses of Congress, and have been lost before they got to the then President; and their consideration, when resumed, must be resumed de novo. The action of the Senate and of this House gives them no validity; we must begin de novo.

It has been suggested to me that the Speaker has decided that some of these bills should go upon the Calendar, and that others should not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that only the adverse reports of the Court of Claims should be placed upon the Calendar. The Chair does not feel that there is any necessity to bring them to the attention of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will sustain the Chair's decision.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I did not hear the remark of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BILLINGHURST.] Did he disagree with the views of the Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand the gentleman from Wisconsin. He only asked for the reading of the law.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There can be no doubt, I think, of the correctness of the views of the Speaker. No Congress can have the right to pass a law for the purpose of controlling the action of a subsequent Congress. Neither the House nor Congress can pass an act that a bill only partially acted on, shall stand before the succeeding Congress where it stood when that Congress expired. Therefore, I should suppose there will be no disagreement with the Speaker's construction, that the bills reported upon favorably by the Court of Claims should be referred to the Committee of Claims. I am not certain but that the adverse reports from that court should also go there to be reported on by that committee. If there be no objection, these adverse reports might be laid on the table till they are finally disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The law directs in reference to that point:

"The claims reported upon adversely shall be placed upon the Calendar when reported; and if the decision of said court shall be confirmed by Congress, said decision shall be conclusive, and the said court shall not at any subsequent period consider said claims, unless such reasons shall be presented to said court as, by the rules of common law or chancery, in suits between individuals, would furnish sufficient ground for granting a new trial."

Mr. BOCOCK. Nobody objects to the Speaker's decision, and I shall object to further debate unless there is an appeal taken from that decision; and if an appeal be taken I shall move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not desire to debate the question. I wish to know whether, if these adverse reports do not go upon the Calendar, there will be any action of the House on them, and whether they do not require the action of the House to decide the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so thinks.

The following bills were then severally read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims:

- A bill for the relief of Asbury Dickins;
- A bill for the relief of John Robb;
- A bill for the relief of Michael Nourse;

- A bill for the relief of Nancy Madison, of Fairfield county, Ohio;
- A bill for the relief of Anna Parrot, of Clinton county, Ohio;
- A bill for the relief of Margarette Taylor, of Putnam county, Tennessee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would like to know what the nature of that bill is. There are some of these bills, as I understand, which relate to revolutionary pensions. It would, perhaps, be as well for such bills to go to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the 153d rule, which requires all these reports and bills to go to the Committee of Claims. The rule is as follows:

"The bills and their accompanying reports from the Court of Claims shall be referred by the Clerk of the House to the Committee of Claims; and it shall be in order every Friday morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, for the Committee of Claims to report with reference to business from the Court of Claims. The bills reported to be printed and placed on the Private Calendar."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is one character of bills which the court have reported upon under the act of 3d February, 1853, giving compensation to the widows of revolutionary soldiers who have died, and where they had married since 1800. The construction of that law at the Pension Office was, that the pension commenced, when the proof was made out, from the date of the passage of the act. The Court of Claims have decided that the pension under that act goes back to March, 1848—five years prior to its passage. That is a question which should be investigated by the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. That committee has always had charge of the subject. It is, in my opinion, I will take occasion to say, purely and solely a claim agent business, gotten up by them; and the decision, if sustained by Congress without some particular provision in the law passing it, will inure to their benefit. I want that bill, when it comes up, to be guarded particularly, and it would be better for Congress to pass a general law, covering all that class of cases, than to pass a bill for each individual case.

For that reason I would have preferred that such bills as I have indicated should go to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. But as the rule is explicit, they will, of course, have to take the direction given to them by the rule.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope there will be unanimous consent to give them that direction, because the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions are better informed on the subject than the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not know that this particular bill is one of that character. But I know that there are a great many of them under the act of February 3, 1853.

Mr. LETCHER. Let all of them, by general consent, that relate to that subject, go to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Exactly the same principle is involved in all of them. If there be unanimous consent, the Clerk will give them all that direction.

No objection being made, all bills from the Court of Claims reported this morning, relating to revolutionary pensions, under the act of February 3, 1853, were ordered to be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill for the relief of George P. Marsh, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

COURT OF CLAIMS CASES.

The report of bills from the Court of Claims was again resumed, and referred as before indicated, as follows:

A bill for the relief of Levina Tepton, of White county, Tennessee;

A bill for the relief of Lucretia Wilcox, of Wayne county, Michigan;

A bill for the relief of Mary Robbins, of Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania;

A bill for the relief of Tempy Connelly, of Johnson county, Kentucky; and

A bill for the relief of Rosamond Robinson, of Belknap county, New Hampshire.

Adverse reports from the Court of Claims, in the several cases of Robert Roberts, Samuel M. Puckett, John P. McEldery, Louis G. Thomas and others, Shepherd Knapp, Cyrus H. McCormick, William W. Cox, J. D. Holman, executor of Jesse B. Holman, John C. Hale, Cassius M. Clay, Susan Decatur, William Neill and others, Thomas Phenix, jr., H. L. Thistle, Abel Gay, J. Boyd, David Myerle, Cortlandt Palmer, and J. K. Rogers, were ordered to be placed upon the Calendar.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report from the disbursing agent of the Coast Survey, showing the number and names of persons employed, and a statement of all expenditures made, under the direction of the Superintendent of Coast Survey; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, certain papers in connection with the contested election case from Nebraska; which were referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL WINN.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a privileged question. I introduced a bill yesterday, for the relief of Samuel Winn, which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I move to reconsider the vote by which that reference was made. I desire to have that bill referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The motion to reconsider prevailed; and the bill was then referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

THE NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Mr. QUITMAN. Mr. Speaker, as I suppose that the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will propose very soon to refer the President's message to the appropriate committee, I ask the permission of the House to introduce the following resolution for the purpose of disposing of a portion of that message:

Resolved, That so much of the President's annual message as relates to the duties of an independent State in its relations with the members of the great family of nations to restrain its people from acts of hostile aggression against their citizens or subjects; and so much as relates to the present neutrality act of 20th of April, 1818; to the fitting out, within the limits of our country, of lawless expeditions against some of the Central American States; to the instructions issued to the marshals and district attorneys, and to the appropriate Army and Navy officers, together with the President's recommendation that we should adopt such measures as will be effective in restraining our citizens from committing such outrages, be referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, with power to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. KELSEY. I object to that.

GEORGE P. MARSH.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have taken up Senate bill (No. 1) for the relief of George P. Marsh, in order that it may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. KEITT. I object.

INFORMATION ABOUT KANSAS.

Mr. GROW. I ask the consent of the House to offer a resolution calling for information which the House needs. I hope there will be no objection to it. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House copies of all instructions by himself or any head of Department to the Governor or other executive officer in the Territory of Kansas, and all correspondence with the same, together with a copy of the executive minutes of said Territory, not already communicated to this House. Also, a copy of the constitution formed at Leecompton, together with a copy of the census and return of the votes in the election of delegates to said convention, and the returns of the election held in said Territory on the 21st of December last, with the number of votes then polled in each election precinct in said Territory, and copies of any other official papers in possession of the Secretary of State relative to Kansas affairs, not already communicated to Congress.

Mr. KEITT. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the first business in order, being

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I offer the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States, to the two Houses of Con-

12. Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the subject of a Pacific railroad, be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the resolutions seriatim, for amendment and discussion.

When the third resolution was read, the chairman announced that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] had given notice of his intention to offer an amendment to that resolution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] however, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The remarks which I intend to submit, relate to the entire series of resolutions. The President's message has now been before the country for nearly a month, and the subject-matters of that message have not, as yet, been referred to the appropriate standing committees. Until that distribution is made, it is impossible for the standing committees of the House properly and regularly to take action upon the subjects of the message. I am very anxious to have as speedy action as possible upon the resolutions, in order that the standing committees may take into consideration the respective parts of the message referred to them. That is all I have to say upon the subject of the resolutions.

THE NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Mr. QUITMAN. I propose to amend the third resolution by striking out the words "neutrality laws," and inserting the following:

And further, that so much of the President's annual message as relates to the duties of an independent State in its relations with the great family of nations to restrain its people from acts of hostile aggression against their citizens or subjects; and so much as relates to the present neutrality act of 20th April, 1818; to the fitting out, within the limits of our country, of lawless expeditions against some of the Central American States; to the instructions to the marshals and district attorneys, and to the appropriate Army and Navy officers, together with the President's recommendations that we should adopt such measures as will be effective in restraining our citizens from committing such outrages, be referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, with power to report by bill or otherwise.

I do not propose, sir, to discuss this question at present, at length. My voice, for the condition of my throat, does not permit it. But I cannot permit the resolutions to go to the House without stating the reasons which, I hope, will induce the House to refer those subjects, connected together, to a select committee.

The proposition which I have offered, as gentlemen will perceive, is that these important questions, linked together, shall be referred to a special committee, where they may receive full and entire consideration. There is no committee of this House—no standing committee—to which they would properly and exclusively belong. What, then, shall we do with these subjects? Let me tell you the country demands that something should be done with them. Ay, sir, we may attempt to get rid of these questions as much as we choose; they are forced upon us by the public sentiment. The country is calling for an expression of this body, and of Congress, upon these important subjects.

At the last Congress, I undertook to introduce a bill calculated to make some important innovations upon our existing neutrality law, and I am aware that it received but little consideration, and that but little attention was drawn to the subject in the Halls of Congress; but gentlemen will do me the justice to say that I am right in the declaration that it has attracted vast attention through the length and breadth of our country. The retired statesman, the philosopher, the men who are, the men who are not, engaged in this scrambling for office—men who look upon the future destiny of our country, and are not afraid to speak boldly upon it—were attracted by the importance of the subject of a modification of our neutrality laws. And this sentiment pervades the people. They have demanded, and they now demand, that Congress shall take some action upon the subject.

I am not opinionative; I do not profess to suppose that my opinions are only right; but, sir, I have come to the conclusion, after much reflection, that the greater part of our laws upon the subject of neutrality should be swept from our statute-books; and I believe that a large proportion of this House, if they will investigate the arguments and the subject, will come to the same conclusion, and will untrammel the citizens of this country from those obligations that the laws have attempted to impose upon their enterprise, their freedom of action, and their relations to other people.

But, Mr. Chairman, I mean simply to impress upon those who hear me that these are questions which we might as well meet. If this intelligent body—if these Representatives of the most intelligent nation on earth—think fit to retain those laws, or think fit to carry out the recommendation of the President, (the first of the kind, I believe, ever made by the Executive of this nation,) and make them more stringent, or think fit to confer upon the Executive more power for the purpose of carrying the existing laws into execution, I must be content; but I will not be content, as a member of this House, until I have in some shape brought this House to a vote upon this important question. Action is demanded, I repeat, by the country; and let us meet the question boldly, and express our sentiments, without resorting to means and subterfuges for the purpose of evading the responsibility of acting upon these important questions.

The proposition of the President, to which I allude in the resolutions I have offered on the subject, involve the most important considerations. They involve the consideration of the duties which independent States owe to each other. Now, sir, I beg to say here, in the face of the nation, that there is no man upon this floor who is more averse than I am to violate any duty, moral or national, that we may owe to the greatest or the weakest Power upon the globe. I seek not to interpolate upon our statute-book, or upon our political system, anything which could disgrace this great country; but I seek to know what are the duties and obligations which we owe to other nations? There seems to be among casuists—I should rather say politicians—a great diversity of opinion on the subject of what does constitute the law of nations, which defines the duties which one nation, as an independent political community, owe to another. Whatever that may be among the enlightened nations of the earth, let us sustain it by our example.

But, sir, what is that law, and what are the obligations that rest upon us as a people? What are the duties we owe to the preservation of our neutral relations with other countries? I differ largely from the view which seems to be taken of these duties and obligations by the President of the United States. I deny that the law of nations requires that each independent State should restrain its citizens from hostile aggressions upon those of another Power. Suppose an American and an Englishman happen to quarrel upon our frontier: the hostility is individual in its character, and not national. Presently I will consider this point more at large. We are not the subjects of this Government; we are citizens, not subjects. Our Government is a limited one. There are rights which we have reserved to ourselves, which we have never parted with to any Government, and these rights cannot be invaded by our own Government. But of this hereafter.

I say, sir, that no Government, though it may possess the control of its own people, and though it may possess despotic power over them, is bound by the law of nations, or by any principle of that law, to protect its individuals from hostilities between them and the individuals of other countries. The question is, whether those hostilities amount to war? Sir, will it be pretended that, if an American and an Englishman, or other foreigner, should fight either in our own country or in another country, and that one should receive a bloody nose, or a stab, or a pistol-shot, either Government is responsible for having permitted such a thing to take place? And no more is a Government responsible, even though it may have the control of its citizens, as ours has not—and God grant it never may have!—for even more enlarged individual hostilities between its citizens and those of another Government.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that each independent State, on the contrary, is only bound to restrain its authority—not to lend its authority to any such conflicts between the citizens of friendly Powers. It is not required, it would be impossible, it would be descending to tyranny, for a Government to take up every little controversy or hostility which may arise between its citizens and the individual citizens of other Powers. This question, however, is to be settled by a reference to international law, and to the best writers on the law of nations. It therefore deserves the attention of a special committee.

But, again, Mr. Chairman, those questions submitted in the President's message involve another most important consideration, both in respect to the character and structure of our Government, and the rights and liberties of the citizens. Our Government is a limited one; it possesses no powers except those that are expressly delegated by the Constitution. Its powers are not granted, but delegated. If they are not expressly delegated, they must be so clearly implied from the powers that are delegated as to make it necessary to carry them into execution. This Government has no control of any power not delegated or clearly implied. Where is found, then, the power delegated to this Government to punish crimes generally? There is no such power. No writer on the law of nations, or on the Constitution of the United States, however federal in his opinions, has arrived at the conclusion that any such power is delegated to this Government.

The only foundation for the exercise of the power attempted to be exercised by the act of 1818 is found in that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to define and punish offenses made against the law of nations. The law of nations is treated by the Constitution as a definite thing, a rule of action, and one which we have not the power to alter. Nor has any other nation the power to alter it. The Constitution, when it speaks of the law of nations, means those sets of conventional rules which have been adopted by the civilized nations of the earth, and which constitute the law of the nations. That is the power given to Congress. We admit, it has no power over the matter. It is idle to talk of the moral obligations that we owe to other nations to restrain our citizens: for our Government, as established, has been excluded and shut out from the exercise of any such power. The Government of the United States, therefore, has no control over this subject beyond that of defining and punishing offenses against the law of nations.

Now, sir, for the purpose of illustrating in what respect the act of 1818—that much-lauded law—attempts to punish offenses or crimes that are unknown to the law of nations, let me give a case: and that is the punishment of American citizens, whose art and skill, and whose occupation is to build vessels—and we know that our country has exceeded all other countries in the models and in the operation of their vessels, both of the naval and the merchant service.

Well, sir, here is a great interest, in which a large portion of the country is deeply interested, and that enterprise is to be stopped because two nations at peace with us may choose to go to war with each other. Is it a rule of the law of nations that two nations, connected with us by friendly ties, should, by their own act, distract and strike down a great enterprise of our country? No, sir; and it is expressly disavowed that any such obligation rests upon neutral nations, by Vattel, Puffendorf, Grotius, and many most distinguished writers upon the public law of nations. Nor do you find, in any work upon this subject, which could be quoted as authority, a single recognition of the principle which goes to show that because two people choose to go to war, they therefore shall stop an enterprise from which they have, perhaps, made their bread. And yet, sir, in the neutrality law of 1818, to which the President has called our attention, and which, from the recommendation he has made, we are to suppose he desires should be made still more stringent, we find those provisions striking a blow at American enterprise and industry. Ay, because it may happen that England and France, or England and Russia, choose to go to war, we are to lose the profitable trade of building vessels of war for them, and for other purposes. There is no such principle.

I have no time now, and do not desire, to enlarge upon the subject. There are numerous provisions of the act of 1818 equally flagrant and violative of the right of citizens of the United States to pursue their occupations of industry as they may desire. Then you have a law which, if I understand it, is recommended to be made still more restrictive in its character—a law which requires you to accommodate yourself to the quarrels of petty despots made in distant Europe, and a large branch of your industry and enterprise is to be stricken down because of the act of some petty despot, or because of some quarrel about succession in distant countries with which we are associated on terms of peace and friendship.

I thus deny that the act of 1818 is a mere carrying out of our neutrality obligations to other States. It goes beyond that. It strikes a blow at the rights and liberty of citizens of the United States. To what extent, Mr. Chairman, is it desired to carry this, and to what extent are we to put it into practice? To the extent, sir, of ordering our subordinates who may chance to command a vessel or fleet, or to the extent of allowing them to sweep over the ocean and enter the harbors of other countries, and there, upon mere suspicion, and upon their own mere suggestion, or even upon the instruction of a Cabinet officer, to seize upon our own citizens or the citizens of other countries, and thus implicate the country in a war, or subject it to the obligation of reparation and indemnity.

It is important, therefore, that the question of the powers which subordinate officers under our Government are permitted to exercise, should be inquired into by this body, especially as we are the direct Representatives of the people. We have the power to declare war. Congress alone has that power. Have we not, therefore, the right to inquire and ascertain how far subordinate officers in this Government shall be permitted perhaps to involve the country either in war, or subject it to claims for damages or reparation?

Then, Mr. Chairman, another important inquiry arises here, which I propose to submit to a select committee; and that is as to the construction of the existing neutrality law of 1818. There are various opinions upon it. What is the proper construction of that law, and what construction will we place upon it? Does that law justify seizure anywhere outside of the marine league—anywhere outside of the actual jurisdiction of the United States? Though I have not time to discuss the matter now, or to present my views fully upon the subject, yet, for one, I deny that, except in cases specified in the Constitution, the Government has any power, unless it is acquired by treaty, to seize the greatest criminal on earth within a foreign jurisdiction, or outside of waters belonging to the United States.

These important considerations, Mr. Chairman, have led us to believe that, although it may be unusual, the House will be impressed with a desire that this great question should be heard, and that we should act and vote upon it. And these considerations have induced me, as there is no appropriate committee exclusively having this subject under its jurisdiction, to ask that this House will allow the appointment of a special committee to take these matters into consideration, and report upon them. Then every man, who desires, can be heard upon the subject. For myself, I would have much to say in explanation of the views which, I am aware, would innovate much upon the system on which we have heretofore acted. I am well aware that arguments must be adduced before the country, in support of a proposition to change or alter laws which have existed for so long a time; but I think it will be found, upon inquiry into their history, that they do not deserve the respect which has been so long paid them.

Before I sit down, Mr. Chairman, I will merely refer to the fact that this act which it is proposed to refer to a committee, with the recommendation of the President that further powers be granted to him, is an act not to punish offenses against the law of nations, but it is entitled "An act to punish certain crimes against the United States." Offenses of this description are termed "constitutional offenses;" but in these latter days we are not satisfied with that; we must call them "crimes against the United States."

I desire now, sir, to give a brief history of the acts which have been passed of the nature of the one which I propose to repeal, or modify, and which I hope will be taken notice of by the select committee, if it shall be organized. The first law of this character passed by the Congress of the United States, was passed in 1794, and was by no means as severe in its provisions and restrictions as is the law now upon the statute-book; because the fathers of the Revolution had too much respect for the rights as citizens which they had reserved to themselves, and had not given to the Government, to enact such a law as that of 1817 or 1818. That law of 1794 was passed at a very remarkable time, when the great and good Washington, as is known to American history, was exceedingly embarrassed on account of American sympathy for the French Revolution. The act was limited in its operation to a few years, and the object of its enactment was to suppress American sympathy for revolutionary France.

A few years afterwards, in 1797, when that act had expired by its own limitation, the French Revolution had not yet died away; a Napoleon had not yet arisen to assume the supreme control of that country; and, therefore, the law was re-enacted, but it soon became obsolete upon the statute-book of our country. It was revived in 1817; and it is remarkable that it was revived at a period when some disturbances existed on our Canadian frontier. It was revived for one year only, at the solicitation of England; and the object of that arbitrary, and perhaps unconstitutional measure, restrictive of the rights of American citizens, was to prevent American sympathy with the Canadian insurgents from finding vent. But, sir, when that law expired, the revolutionary struggles of the Spanish colonies on this continent had begun to show their heads, and American sympathy turned, as it will always turn, in favor of liberty and independence. The sympathy of the American people was bursting forth in favor of those Spanish colonies, which were then struggling against one of the most odious despotisms on earth, to gain their national independence and their liberty. It was then that Spain and other European powers sought the aid of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the legislation of Congress to check that sympathy; and as Mr. Clay, who was then a warm advocate of the freedom and independence of the Spanish colonies, said, the law of 1818 was obtained by the incessant teasing of foreign ministers, and that law was more severe than any enacted for the prevention and punishment of offenses against our own citizens.

It is a remarkable feature of this case, that every one of these laws that has stood upon our statute-book has resulted from a desire to check the outburst of American sympathy in favor of those engaged in a struggle for liberty; they were enacted to do that which no Government on earth can do—to control the sympathy of our people in favor of those nations which were struggling for their political freedom and independence. It was this spirit which enlisted the sympathy of our people in behalf of those struggling for independence in Hungary. It has been manifested, sir, on several other occasions, and I trust that it will never be restrained by law. Let it have its way. Our people always sympathize with the weak and the oppressed. They are not going to violate the laws of nations. They are never guilty of cruelty and oppression to the weak. "Ah, but," say some, "we do not hear of these expeditions against the strong powers of Europe, against the Government of England, or of Russia." Why? Because the people of those countries are opposed to revolution and are contented with their modes of government. They are only undertaken to aid those who are struggling against despotic Governments to acquire for themselves the liberty which we enjoy. Is it not right and proper that American sympathy should be extended to those thus situated? Should you punish those who venture to do what Lafayette did—go forward and assist a struggling people?

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say much at this time. The condition of my voice has not permitted me to do justice to this subject or to myself. I ask the indulgence of the House to say, that I have not offered this amendment for the purpose of distracting public attention, nor for the purpose of creating contests between this party or that party. I have been actuated by no unkind feelings towards the Administration, but simply from a desire that this great struggle, now attracting the attention of, not the South alone, but of thousands in the North, should receive full and ample consideration in this House, and that we should meet the question and act upon it.

If the House is disposed to consider the law of 1818 as proper and right, I will acquiesce; but I give notice to the country, I will not rest satisfied until some action or some vote has been had upon it. I want to see some action upon it; and I hope the vote upon this amendment will be considered a test vote of favor or disfavor towards a modification of the neutrality laws.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not rise for the purpose of taking issue with the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, as to the points or merits of his resolution. I understand that the most distinguishing characteristic of our Government is, that it is a Government of law—international law, constitutional law, statute law, or common law. I say that, in the family of nations, the most distinguishing characteristic of our Government is, that it is a Government of law. In drawing, therefore, the resolution to refer that portion of the President's message to the Committee on the Judiciary, I had in my eye the fact that, in a Government of law—in a Government constituted as ours is—the Judiciary Committee was the proper one to which to refer this matter. What other committee in this Government is competent to consider this question? I did not mean, nor does the resolution mean, to imply any pre-judged opinions upon the subject of the neutrality laws. The honorable gentleman from Mississippi, however he may be inclined to restrict the powers of the Federal Government, will never admit that this Government can fall beneath any other Government under the canopy of heaven in its character of a Government of laws. Whatever may be the limitation of its delegated powers by the reserved powers of the States, I am certain the gentleman from Mississippi will never doubt its just power in the family of nations.

Now, I do not know that I differ from the honorable gentleman from Mississippi upon the subject of the neutrality laws. I mean to confine my remarks exclusively to the question of reference. But as the honorable gentleman from Mississippi has chosen, at this stage of the proceedings, to go into the merits of this question, I must set him right on a few points that command my attention. The gentleman says that the President, in his annual message, recommends, instead of the repeal of the neutrality laws, (as my honorable friend would have it,) the enactment of more stringent provisions for their enforcement. Now, my honorable friend is mistaken, or I am, in the construction he puts upon the language of the message. It does not even indorse the present neutrality laws. But, sir, the Executive of this nation tells you that if you want him, in obedience to his oath of office, to execute your laws, you must give him the power to carry them into effect.

Mr. QUITMAN. If the gentleman will allow me I will call his attention to the language of the President in his message. He says:

"I commend the whole subject to the serious attention of Congress, believing that our duty and our interest, as well as our national character, require that we should adopt such measures as will be effectual in restraining our citizens from committing such outrages."

Now, sir, if the President, in this language, did not intend to recommend the enactment of more stringent laws upon the subject, but simply to ask for additional executive powers, I shall be very happy to learn that I was mistaken in the construction I have placed upon it, and that the recommendation is not so objectionable as I supposed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Allow me to say to my honorable friend from Mississippi, once for all, that I do not undertake to speak for the President. I speak merely of my construction of the message of the President, as I understand it, speaking as the Executive of the nation to the legislative branch of the Government. I understand the honorable gentleman from Mississippi to take issue with the laws as they now stand upon the statute-book. Well, sir, my point is, that he must not infer that the President of the United States will not concur with him—certainly not that I shall not concur with him in a revision of those laws. I repeat, sir, that the proper construction of the language of the President's message which the gentleman has quoted is this. The President of the United States says to the legislative branch of the Government: "If you wish me to execute your laws, if you want me to carry out the provisions of your statutes, you must clothe me with greater power. I must have more stringent legislation." But it does not follow—it is a non sequitur to say—that because the President of the United States says this he is not in favor of the repeal or modification of the neutrality laws. I am not prepared to say how far I shall be willing to go with the gentleman from Mississippi in favor of such repeal or modification when the question comes properly before us.

The honorable gentleman has no personal feeling against the Executive; he can have none other than in so far as he may perhaps differ from the views the Executive has expressed. He has a perfect right to differ from the Executive; but I shall be happy if I can be able to satisfy his judgment that the question as to the merits of the neutrality laws remains an open question. I do not know yet how far I may be prepared to go with the honorable gentleman upon this subject when it legitimately comes before this body.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps there are gentlemen here who wish to discuss the subject of the neutrality law of 1818; but, occupying the position which I do, I feel it to be my duty to hasten the action of the committees of this House upon the appropriate subject-matters of legislation embraced in the President's message. After having made a brief reply to the gentleman from Mississippi, I shall speak to the question simply of reference of these subjects to the appropriate committees. I look upon the Committee on the Judiciary as the legitimate committee for the investigation of the matter alluded to; and, in so believing, I am supported, I am happy to say, by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi himself. I concur with the honorable gentleman in every particular of his speech, and he should concur with me in the question of reference. But the gentleman asks for a special committee; a special committee to pass upon the powers of this Government; a special committee to usurp the jurisdiction of a standing committee which has existed in this House since the foundation of the Government. Special committees have ordinarily been created when special subjects have arisen. They have been created when an emergency, or a particular occasion, had given rise to a matter never before settled by precedent, and which legitimately belonged to none of the regular standing committees. In such cases the Speaker has been authorized to appoint a special committee, to devote its special attention to the particular and special subject referred to it; but there is not a single instance on record where the legitimate jurisdiction of a standing committee of this House has been usurped by, or transferred to, a special committee. On the contrary, it has been the uniform practice of both branches of Congress, since the beginning of the Government, to refer, for investigation and report, all questions pertaining to international law, the constitutional or statute law, and all questions pertaining to the functions and powers of the Government and its officers, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

But, sir, I want my honorable friend from Mis-

Mississippi to understand that, in advocating the reference of the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, I do not mean, in the slightest degree, to be understood as taking ground against any modification of the neutrality law. I have strong doubts as to the extent to which this Government has gone in the enactment of that law. I do not wish, therefore, in moving the reference of the gentleman's proposition to the Committee on the Judiciary, to be understood as throwing obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of the object he has in view. I am in favor of investigation into the question, and believe that the Committee on the Judiciary is fully competent for the discharge of that duty. That committee is competent to examine the whole subject, from beginning to end. And when that committee does report its conclusions from an investigation of the facts referred to it, I shall then be prepared, if necessary, to give my views on the subject.

Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, at the last session of Congress, moved the reference of a similar proposition to the Committee on the Judiciary. I find, in the House Journal, 1856-57, page 916, the following:

"Mr. QUITMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (House bill No. 312) to repeal certain sections of the neutrality law; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary."

I quote this for the reason that I want the powerful aid of my friend from Mississippi in the enforcement of the position I take on the question of reference.

Mr. QUITMAN. A single remark. I have learned by experience that the Judiciary Committee was not the proper one, for it never reported on the proposition at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I never doubted the gentleman's skill in meeting a point of this kind. While, however, his experience of the last session has been sufficient to enlighten him on that subject, it has not been the case with myself, or with the House or country. I hope that my motion to refer the proposition to the Committee on the Judiciary will prevail.

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Chairman, is this proposition debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. KEITT. Well, sir, I propose to say a few words on this subject, and strictly in reply to what I understand to be the positions assumed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. As to the reference, whether to a select committee or to the Committee on the Judiciary, I am entirely indifferent. I do not see, however, that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary on the ground stated by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, for that necessarily involves the idea that all the legal talent in the House is upon that committee, which may or may not be true. I take it for granted that a special question like this, involving the public interest and the public feeling to a great extent, may very properly be made the subject of investigation by a select committee, and for the simple reason that the regular committee may be so engrossed with mere matters of detail pertinently belonging to it, that it may not have time to give this subject a proper investigation.

The special committee having more time, and being selected with special reference to the fitness of its members on the particular subject committed to them, may be eminently a proper committee.

But, sir, the object which I have in view is to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to what may be an error on his part, in reference to the President's message. I understood him to say that the President had waived the question whether or not he was for a repeal or a modification of the neutrality law, but simply asked to be clothed with new powers in case he was expected to fulfill the provisions of existing law.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. My friend has misapprehended me. I did not mean to say, nor do I think I did, that the President had waived the question, or that I spoke for him. I said distinctly that I spoke my own opinions of the message as I had formed them from reading its recommendations. My opinion is that the President has made no waiver, and that he has given no opinion, in one way or the other, on the neutrality law. But he did say that if the existing statute were carried out as it is commonly understood by the courts of this country, it would be necessary to have further legislation to enable him to do so.

Mr. KEITT. The word waiver may not have been technically correct; but substantially, the statement I made is correct. The gentleman says that the President, in his judgment, avoids or forbears making an expression of opinion upon the neutrality law. He asks, then, for what? To be clothed with new powers to carry out existing provisions of the law. What provisions of the law? Let us see what he has asked? He has asked that he should have the Army and Navy of the United States; and for what? To hunt the citizens of the United States upon the high seas, and upon foreign soil. Does he want the Army and Navy of the United States to prevent the sailing of a fleet from your shores? Does he want them to prevent an expedition from going from your own cities? He has already the Army and the Navy, by the very law itself, for that purpose. If he wants new powers, what does he want them for? Why, to follow those men, to follow them upon the water, to arrest them upon the land—upon foreign land—and to do that you must subvert your whole neutrality laws.

Sir, he does not ask for new powers to carry out existing laws, but he asks substantive powers upon a new thing. The neutrality laws forbid capture upon the high seas— forbid capture and seizure upon foreign soil. If the President of the United States is allowed to seize upon water or on a foreign land, then he has the rights of a despot; for he must punish by virtue of his military power as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. The neutrality laws limit the jurisdiction of the court to offenses committed within three miles—one marine league—from the shore. If, then, you capture these men, you must capture them for an offense. If it be an offense, then your own courts cannot, under the law, take cognizance of the offense; and the offense must be punished by virtue of the military power of the President. I say this in illustration of the fact, that any pursuit of an expedition beyond three miles—one marine league—from land, is unlawful; and any capture upon foreign soil, passing by the rights of the invaded Government, is unlawful, too. Yes, as my friend from Georgia here [Mr. STEPHENS] says, it is robbery to do it.

Sir, I do not know what the position of the Administration in reference to this matter is; but one thing, I believe, is pretty well known, and that is, that Captain Chatard, in sight of Point Arenas, allowed the disembarkation of Walker because he had no power to prevent it; and he was recalled in disgrace; and that Commodore Paulding, from that very spot, sent his men on shore, captured and arrested Walker and his men, and he has not yet been recalled in disgrace. If he is, then Captain Chatard is recalled in disgrace for not doing a thing, and Commodore Paulding is recalled in disgrace for doing it. The process of logic by which this is to be accomplished, it is not for me to adjust. I say the admission of one thing is the exclusion of another; and the exclusion of one is the admission of another. If, then, Captain Chatard is recalled in disgrace for not doing a thing, I may legitimately infer that Commodore Paulding is to be sustained for doing the act.

But I did not rise for the purpose of arguing this question. I rose for the purpose of preventing an unfounded remark, as I believe it to be, of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, going to the country, and producing what I believe to be an improper influence. If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is right, then I believe that the President has the right, under the neutrality laws, to use the Army and Navy to capture these men upon the high seas, or in a foreign land. His remark is founded upon that, or it is founded upon nothing. And it was to prevent the circulation of what I believe to be an erroneous opinion, that I have gone thus far into this discussion, and I do not propose now to pursue the subject further.

Mr. KELSEY. I rise to a question of order. I submit whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] is in order; whether it is competent for the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to refer a part of the message to a committee which has no existence?—the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union not being competent to appoint a select committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from New York. If the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi shall be adopted, when it shall have been reported to the House provision will have been made for such a committee.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not rise for the purpose of replying to the gentleman from South Carolina, but simply to read that portion of the message referred to. The gentleman intimated that I have thrown out an unfounded opinion. As I do not wish to be misunderstood, I will read a clause of the message:

"The isthmus of Central America, including that of Panama, is the great highway between the Atlantic and Pacific, over which a large portion of the commerce of the world is destined to pass. The United States are more deeply interested than any other nation in preserving the freedom and security of all the communications across this isthmus. It is our duty, therefore, to take care that they shall not be interrupted either by invasions from our own country or by wars between the independent States of Central America. Under our treaty with New Granada of the 12th December, 1846, we are bound to guaranty the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama, through which the Panama railroad passes, 'as well as the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over the said Territory.' This obligation is founded upon equivalents granted by the treaty to the Government and people of the United States."

"Under these circumstances, I recommend to Congress the passage of an act authorizing the President, in case of necessity, to employ the land and naval forces of the United States to carry into effect this guarantee of neutrality and protection. I also recommend similar legislation for the security of any other route across the isthmus in which we may acquire an interest by treaty."

And upon this I mean merely to remark that the President asks you for power to execute the laws upon your statute-books, in fulfillment of treaties already made, in which the faith of this Government is pledged in the family of nations; and if you want him, as the Executive of this nation, to carry out our treaty obligations and laws, you must clothe him with sufficient powers. He does not, as my honorable friend understands him, ask for additional powers and additional legislation, but simply that the treaty obligations of the Government, and the legislation upon the statute-books, for which the faith of the Government is pledged, shall be carried out; that you will either repeal those laws now existing, or if you need them, that you shall pass such laws as will enable him to carry out in good faith the obligations of this Government.

Mr. KEITT. I desire to know, from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether I understand him correctly, as saying that the President does not ask for any new or fresh powers in relation to the neutrality laws? If he does ask such powers, then the argument holds good, for I have said nothing about treaties or this Isthmus route.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina quoted the closing portion of this paragraph which I read.

Mr. KEITT. I quoted it from memory.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am aware of that, and the gentleman's quotation was correct. He quoted the close of the paragraph in which the President of the United States asks Congress to put at his disposal the military and naval power of the Government; but in quoting that clause, he made no reference to the subject-matter upon which the President wishes to exercise that power. I merely quoted the whole paragraph for the purpose of showing that in the particular instance referred to by the President—and it is the only instance in which he asks for that power—he asks for it in order that he may be enabled to carry out the treaties of the Government and the neutrality laws as they exist, or as you will make them, if you please, that he may afford that protection to the transit route across the Isthmus of Panama that this Government has guaranteed in the treaty with New Granada.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I agree with much that has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] as to the propriety of referring this subject-matter to the Judiciary Committee. It is only on great occasions, sir, that we should raise select committees. I concur almost entirely with the whole argument that has been made by the honorable member from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN.] I wish this matter inquired into. I wish it inquired into by some committee that will report. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we live under a Government of law. Everything that he has said upon that subject meets my hearty assent. I think that when there is difficulty about laws, either in their construction or in their defects, they had better be looked into by the legislators. That is our business.

I do not intend, now, sir, to go into an argument upon the question which has been sprung upon us to-day. I intend to wait until I can hear from the Executive, in response to the resolution which we passed yesterday. But, I take this occasion to say, in advance of a reply from the Executive, that under my understanding of what are called the neutrality laws—but laws which bear no such name upon their faces or in their titles—under the laws which set forth offenses against the United States, or crimes against the United States, I do not understand that in this case, there has been any offense committed against the United States, or any crime, or, even, any violation of those laws. But, if others think that those laws have been violated, in this particular case, I wish, for one, that those laws should be amended; I wish that some committee should inquire into the matter.

I take occasion, also, to say in advance, sir, that if it be true that a naval officer of the United States has gone upon a foreign soil and arrested citizens of a foreign country, or American citizens, and deprived them of their liberty, deprived them of their property, it was a great outrage, unjustified by law or the semblance of law; and such officer, sir, needs the reprimand of his superior official. As suggested by a gentleman near me, naval officers cannot expound these international laws.

I will give the reasons very briefly—for I did not expect to address the House at all—why I make this assertion, and it is not made without thought and reflection; our international laws, as they are termed, as I read them, give the President, give the naval authorities of this Government, no authority whatever to interfere with any citizen of the United States outside of a marine league from the coast of the United States. If any gentleman will hand me the law I will read it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I admit that.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Very well, sir; I state the law from the book, and it is conceded that I am correct.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not concede that to be the proper construction of the law.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Virginia does not concede that to be a proper construction of the law. It is my construction. Here is the law. The seventh section provides that the district court "shall take cognizance of complaints, by whomsoever instituted, in cases of captures made within the waters of the United States, or within a marine league of the coast or shore thereof." Now, the eighth section provides that in every case of the capture of a ship or vessel "within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States, as before defined," and in every case in which a process, and so forth, shall issue from any court of the United States, and be disobeyed, and so forth—mark you, sir, "within the jurisdiction and protection of the United States, as before defined,"—the President is authorized to use the land and naval forces. Now, sir, under what other section of the law does the President get the power to use the land and naval forces?

Mr. BOCKOCK. I do not know that I disagree with the gentleman from Georgia, but I desire to hear his opinion or construction of a particular clause in the eighth section, to which he has not yet referred.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What is it?

Mr. BOCKOCK. The eighth section goes on to say that the President of the United States shall, for certain specified purposes, have command of the Army and Navy; and then comes in this clause, which is a separate and distinct one:

"And, also, [that is, shall also have the use of the Army and Navy,] for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territory of the United States, against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace."

That is to say, the President shall have the use of the Army and Navy to prevent the carrying on of any such enterprise or expedition from the coast of the United States against any foreign nation with whom we are at peace. Under that law, I feel myself at liberty to state that vessels have been captured in mid-ocean—not for the purpose of trial—because the jurisdiction of the district court does not extend beyond the distance from shore alluded to by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.] But, sir, vessels have been arrested under these circumstances, and turned back for the purpose of preventing them making a descent upon a nation with which we were at peace.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. When? When?

Mr. BOCKOCK. A gentleman, whom I consider good authority, has informed me that it has been repeatedly done.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I want to know when?

Mr. BOCKOCK. I would say to the gentleman that I am not prepared at this moment to refer to any specific instance. I repeat, however, that I have been informed from good authority that such instances have occurred; and I have no doubt that when the question comes up regularly for consideration, I shall be able to cite the gentleman to instances which have occurred such as I have mentioned.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would say that, on inquiring of a gentleman who ought to have a knowledge on the point—a very high official—he stated to me that no case of the sort had ever occurred within his knowledge since the act of 1818. But he did remark that it had been construed, ever since 1818, as giving this power to arrest on the high seas. I asked him if a case had ever arisen under that act. There was none that he knew of. If there has been a case of the kind I should like to know it. I do not know of any myself; but I am not prepared to say that there has not been any. This gentleman, however, ought to have known if there was; and he did not seem to have knowledge of any.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have never known any such case, and when the gentleman says there have been such cases, I ask, emphatically, when? I repeat that if there be any authority under any statute of the United States, it must be under this eighth section of the act of 1818, as far as I know. Does this eighth section confer the power? It says that "in every case of the capture of a ship or vessel within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States, as before defined." "As before defined" is within the marine league. Most clearly, therefore, it could not be within any of the instances alluded to. The gentleman from Virginia must admit that. But he cites the latter clause—that the land and naval forces may be employed "for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition." That is the way it reads. Why, sir, it is not a new section—it is not a new clause. It goes right on, and I should say that "also" means "within the jurisdiction and protection of the United States, as before defined." That is my reading of the word "also." "Also within the jurisdiction and protection of the United States, as before defined." I cannot make any other sense of it. "For the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States." Where? Does it say in Guatemala or Nicaragua? Does it say upon any island in the sea? Does it say to prevent men upon the high seas, upon any island, or in any ocean? No, sir; but from the territories of the United States and jurisdiction of the United States—from within three miles, if you please, or a marine league of the coast of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my mind is clear upon this subject. If any such outrage has been committed upon the coast of Nicaragua, as the seizure of either American citizens or others by a naval officer, he has done that for which he had no authority. And when the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] stands up for the maintenance of law, I concur with him; but when Commodore Paulding, under the pretense of maintaining law, goes out upon the high seas to make himself the judge of criminals, and calls men pirates who are just as good men as he is, and a good deal better, it does not come from him with a good grace to commend himself as an enforcer of law.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he understood me as advocating any such position?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania as indicating no such sentiment; for, as I took occasion to state, he expressed no opinion upon the subject. But the conduct of Paulding was no less an outrage, and I am giving my opinion upon that subject. But, sir, I have not the information officially, and, hence, I do not wish to discuss the question before I get it. But, sir, I say the action was without law, as I read the laws of my country; and it will not do for him, or any person, to set himself up as the advocate of law, when he is outraging law and outraging justice, and committing a private injury, which ought to be redressed. Our country would set an example of shame to other nations, if this gross outrage of private rights were permitted against the greatest felon on earth. If we are to set an example to other nations, let us set an example worthy to be followed; and not under the pretense of vindicating law, become the violators of all law.

Now, sir, if this act was committed—I speak in advance of the message—private property has been taken possession of by our naval forces without authority of law, and I say it should be restored. Reparation should be made, restitution should be made, and it will be an outrage upon the part of our Government if it is not done. The men, every one of them, should be sent back where they were taken from, and Walker—felon, as some call him, and fugitive from justice, as a gentleman yesterday spoke of him—should be sent back. Sir, if he is a fugitive from justice, let the courts so determine. I understand that he left this country in a ship with a regular clearance. He gave his bond, and he can answer to his bond; but I think it will tax the ingenuity of an American Representative to show that he was a fugitive from justice. When he was brought back upon his parole he came into the hands of the marshal of the southern district of New York, with whom he went before the Executive, and all they could say to him was, "go in peace, we have got no charge against you."

Sir, I say that if Walker is a felon, he ought to be punished as a felon. If he has violated the law, I am not here to apologize for or excuse him. But if he has committed no offense, it is a national disgrace deeper far than any I have yet heard of. If he has committed any offense, you will not even try him for it after he has been brought back to your shores. I say it is an outrage—a stigma upon the nation. My judgment is, that as the matter now stands, as I understand it, Walker should be put in a national ship, with all his men and all his property, taken back, and put just where he was before the outrage commenced—in statu quo ante bellum, I think is the phrase used in international law.

But, as I have said, I do not wish to discuss those questions to-day. I do not know what position the Administration have taken. I have merely risen to give my reasons why, in my judgment, it is a subject which needs investigation. If our laws are as gentlemen construe them, or as some gentlemen do, I think they ought to be taken from the statute-book. I am against them. I hold that no citizen of this country can be punished by this Government, except where there is a violation of such laws as are passed in pursuance of constitutional authority. There is no such thing as common-law offenses against the United States. They have not been recognized since the alien and sedition law was swept from the statute-book, and I trust they never will be again. I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that there is not a single violation of international law, or the law of nations, by anything that Walker has done, or a violation of anything contemplated by the act of 1818.

Sir, this matter should be inquired into. My object in rising was to propose an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi. I hope he will concur in it. I move to strike out the words "a select committee," and, in their stead, to insert "the Committee on the Judiciary;" and to add the words "who are hereby required to report upon the expediency of a repeal or modification of the act of the 20th of April, 1818."

Mr. QUITMAN. I accept the gentleman's amendment, if it is in my power to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman to prepare the amendment as modified.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. As I understand the modification, it is to refer the question to the Committee on the Judiciary. I accept it as a modification of my motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word to the gentleman from Georgia before he takes his seat. It is not a matter of any consequence to me what direction this House may see fit to give to that portion of the President's message.

It is true that I am a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and it seems to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia amounts to an expression of distrust of the action of that committee, by requiring them to do what they are compelled to do under the rules of this House in the discharge of their ordinary duties.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not wish the gentleman to understand me in any such way. I do not think that it is disrespect to any committee to require it to report on the expediency of any measure.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is the duty of the committee to report, and as one member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I feel authorized to say that that committee will report on the subjects referred to it, without being required to do so by express resolution of the House. If this subject go to that committee, I am satisfied that it will promptly act on it, and report its action at once to the House without the requirement of the resolution, which I confess seems to me to be a little harsh.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman, I think, is a little sensitive.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not at all.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I suppose there is hardly a committee which has not had submitted to them propositions with instructions. The committee of which I am a member, had instructions of a similar character to report, &c. We did not consider it harsh. It is usual. Further than that, it is parliamentary. I do not doubt that the Committee on the Judiciary are inclined to discharge their duties. It is our right to make them do it when they do not do it. It is our privilege, whether the committee likes the harshness of the language used or not. I am for the resolution in the words in which it is at present couched.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is all true, that it is the right of the House to require its committees to do their duty when any inclination is evinced to disregard them. But I ask with what justice and magnanimity, with what propriety, this House requires a committee to discharge its duty before it has shown a disinclination to do it?

The gentleman says that his committee has been instructed. I apprehend he is under a mistake. This is not an instruction to inquire into the expediency of doing or not doing a certain thing, but a requirement that a certain thing shall be done. To do what? That the committee shall report. The instruction goes to the point of report and not to the point of examining the subject. You require that they shall report.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Report what?

Mr. HOUSTON. Upon the expediency of a certain proposition submitted to them.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. You do not say in the resolution that the committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of such a thing, and report thereon, but you refer a matter to them, and require that they "shall report;" your requirement is confined in its present phraseology to the fact that the committee shall report, as if you feared the committee would refuse or neglect to report, notwithstanding your rules require of all committees to make reports of matters submitted to them. Now, sir, with all respect for the gentleman, I believe that that part of the phraseology of the resolution as it now stands is wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair understands the question, it is this: The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] submitted an amendment. In the subsequent conversation which took place, the Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi as a modification of his resolution. Is the Chair correct?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Chair is correct; but there was a misapprehension on my own part. When the gentleman from Georgia stated that he would offer an amendment to the resolution, substituting the Committee on the Judiciary for a special committee, accompanied with the provision that that committee should report promptly on the subject, I accepted it as a modification of my resolution. I understand now that the gentleman from Georgia meant to embrace the whole subject-matter of the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, and I cannot accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the proposition stands as it did before.

Mr. BOCOCK. At this late hour I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the committee, and it was not until a few moments ago that I thought of saying a word in reference to this subject at this time. A resolution was adopted yesterday, calling upon the President of the United States for information touching this subject, and I felt it proper, as a member of this House, to wait until that information should be before us. The position that, by the favor of the Speaker, I occupy as chairman of one of the committees of this House, which may be supposed properly to have cognizance of the conduct of Commodore Paulding, made it peculiarly desirable to me to wait until the whole case should be spread before us. When the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] was discussing this question this morning, and was maintaining a particular construction of the neutrality law, in view of one particular section of it, which construction I felt sure that another section contradicts, I rose in my place and called his attention to the last named clause, rather with a view to hear his construction of it, than for the purpose of proclaiming a difference of opinion with him. My interposition, as the House knows, led to some discussion between us. Lest on this account I might possibly be supposed by the House and the country to occupy upon all the questions which have been involved a different position from that of the gentleman from Georgia, I have risen now to deny that such is the fact. Indeed, if I must be required to commit myself upon the question of Commodore Paulding's acts at this early stage of the proceedings, and with such information as we possess, I should say that his conduct was without law, without authority so far as I know, and altogether improper. However, I say that I prefer to wait until all the facts are before the House, and to discuss the matter in view of these facts.

I am in favor of having this question of the neutrality law inquired into. The difference between the construction of the gentleman from Georgia, and my own, does not create any difference of opinion between us in regard to that matter. If, under the neutrality laws, the Army and Navy cannot be used by the President of the United States in arresting an expedition beyond three miles, or a marine league, from shore, as contended for by the gentleman from Georgia, I am in favor of inquiry and action with a view to settle the construction for the country. If, on the contrary, the power is given to the President under the act of 1818, as I contend is the case, to employ the naval power to arrest vessels in mid-ocean, and prevent their progress, when carrying expeditions of this sort, I am still in favor of investigation and inquiry as to the propriety of a change of the law.

Now I may be excused, under these circumstances, in saying a word in justification of the construction I gave to this law when I interrupted the gentleman from Georgia, a few minutes ago. I do not think that the technical and verbal criticism of the gentleman from Georgia is correct. In the eighth section the law points out the cases in which the President of the United States shall have command of the Army and Navy. It says he shall have command of the Army and Navy for the purpose of arresting a vessel which is being fitted out for unlawful purposes. He shall have command of the Army and Navy to take a vessel when it has embarked upon an unlawful expedition, and, process being issued, there is not otherwise force enough to arrest it within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. Then, having pointed out several specific cases in which he shall have command of the Army and Navy, the law also says—what? It states another and distinct case in which the President of the United States shall have the right to use the Army and Navy. In enumerating the cases in which the Army and Navy may be employed, it says:

"Also, for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States, against the territories or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with which the United States shall be at peace."

I hold that this law gives power to employ the Navy on part of the high seas where it may be needed to defeat and turn back unlawful and predatory expeditions against friendly nations.

I will make a suggestion in passing, though not necessarily connected with the subject, in reference to using the Navy of the United States in enforcing the criminal law. The jurisdiction of the courts may not extend beyond a certain distance at sea. The "high seas" constitute, however, a middle ground, upon which each nation may exercise a protectorate and police over its own people. If an offense be committed within the jurisdiction of our courts, and the criminal escapes by way of the high seas, that being neutral ground, he may there be captured and brought back for trial in the appropriate courts. The gentleman from Georgia asked me for a case in which a vessel had been arrested in mid-ocean, carrying troops to another and a friendly land for the purpose of making an attack upon it.

Mr. QUITMAN. I would inquire if the class of cases to which the gentleman now refers—of vessels seized upon the high seas—is not limited to offenses committed upon the high seas not within the jurisdiction of the United States; and whether this offense, if any, was not committed within the United States?

Mr. BOCOCK. I think the power of arrest at sea has a wider application than that suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi. A case has been mentioned to me by a gentleman learned in the law, and generally well informed upon all these questions. It was the case of the celebrated Lewis Baker, who, after the murder of Bill Poole, in New York, attempted to escape by sea. He was pursued by a vessel of the United States, and was arrested before he entered the port of Payal. And even if my friend from Mississippi was correct in his construction of the law, it would not follow that the President of the United States would not have the right to arrest a vessel in mid-ocean, which was engaged in an unlawful expedition against peaceful territory, because the offense, though commenced on our own soil, is continued upon the ocean.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would ask for information, whether the case referred to was not one where the man Baker was taken off of one of our own ships by another ship of our own; and whether the jurisdiction which would attach to the ship might not affect that case?

Mr. BOCOCK. I am not definitely informed in reference to it. It may have been so, for aught I know. But as I was saying, it might be very well argued under this law, that the offense was initiated and commenced on our own shores, and is continued upon the ocean up to the time when the expedition is landed upon a foreign shore.

That does not affect the power of prevention given by the latter clause of the eighth section of the neutrality law. I must say, in justice to myself, that when I came into this Hall to-day, I did not expect to enter upon the discussion of this question. It was my design not to do so until after the proper information had been elicited.

Mr. KEITT. The gentleman says that the President of the United States is authorized to use the Army and Navy upon the high seas to capture this vessel. I wish to know from him whether or not these offenders would be amenable to any courts in this country?

Mr. BOCOCK. If the gentleman will look at the law, he will see that a separate power is given to the President of the United States over and above the capture of these men, for the purpose of bringing them to trial. He has the power to employ the Army and Navy to prevent these expeditions from landing upon foreign shores.

Mr. KEITT. I do not see that.

Mr. BOCOCK. The law gives him power to prevent the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territory or jurisdiction of the United States against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince, State, colony, district, or people, with which the United States shall be at peace.

Mr. KEITT. That does not apply to seizing persons on a foreign soil.

Mr. BOCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I have not said one single word claiming the power to the President, or to naval officers, to capture men upon the soil of a foreign nation. On the contrary, my opinion is, judging from the information we possess, that Commodore Paulding acted entirely without authority.

I think, however, Mr. Chairman, that all this discussion is premature. We have called for the facts. Let us get them. Let us examine all the documents that may be produced here, calmly and impartially, and let us give our verdict in relation to the arrest of Walker like men who are conscious of the importance of the question; like judges, and not like advocates.

I will say further, that I rose for the purpose of preventing the idea going further, because of the question I put to the gentleman from Georgia, that I am a defender of Commodore Paulding in the position he has taken in relation to this matter. I am not so. I listened with pleasure to the gentleman from Georgia. I differ with him in his construction of the law in the particular which I have named. But I am not the less willing, because I differ with him in the construction of the law, that the proper committee of this House shall inquire into the propriety of modifying or repealing it. I am in favor of such an inquiry.

As to the particular committee to which the subject should be referred, I deem it a matter of very small importance. I know many of the gentlemen who compose the Committee on the Judiciary. I know several of them to be eminent lawyers—men of business—men of sound, clear, critical, and scrutinizing minds. They have not had an opportunity yet to show whether they intend to discharge their duties diligently and faithfully or not. I believe they will do so. I believe it is improper, at this period of the session, seemingly and indirectly to pass a vote of condemnation upon those gentlemen, either by taking business from them that legitimately belongs to them, or by any other direct or indirect course. I am in favor, therefore, of referring this matter to the Judiciary Committee, believing that they will, with diligence and intelligence, inquire into it and report to the House. When a report shall come from them, it will be time enough to go into the discussion of the neutrality laws. I shall then, probably, ask to be heard on the subject more at length.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I have but a few words to say. I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, who has just taken his seat, that until we hear from the executive department, in response to the resolution that we passed yesterday, we are not in possession of such facts as will enable us to discuss this question understandingly.

Sir, I have been pleased to see the manifestations upon the other side of the House, of jealousy of executive encroachments on the rights of the citizens of the country. It is, sir, encouraging; and when indignation was expressed by the honorable member from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] that the President, without authority of law, should use the Army of the Republic to perpetrate outrages upon justice and right, I responded to the sentiment. But I ask that the rule which gentlemen lay down for the sea shall apply to the land also. Your Army has been used for two years and more as a police force to perpetrate outrages upon justice, and uphold in one of the Territories of the Union violations of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution of your country to every American freeman. That Army has been used by your Executive as a police force to uphold a despotism as odious as any that exists on the face of God's earth, and by the voices, too, of the gentlemen who to-day denounce the Executive for maintaining the laws of the country upon the water. This is all I have to say. I desired only to call attention to the fact that the rule would apply on the land as well as on the sea.

Mr. MAYNARD obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield me the floor until I can get the resolution in the proper form.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will do so. I was about to ask that the resolution, as it now stands, might be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] withdrew his amendment, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] modified the resolution so as to place it in the shape in which it will now be read.

The Clerk then read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to a uniform bankrupt law, and that so much of the President's annual message as relates to the duties of an independent State in its relations with the members of the great family of nations to restrain its people from acts of hostile aggression against their citizens or subjects; and so much as relates to the present neutrality law of 20th of April, 1818; to the fitting out, within the limits of our country, of lawless expeditions against some of the Central American States; to the instructions issued to the marshals, and district attorneys, and to the appropriate Army and Navy officers, together with the President's recommendation that we should adopt such measures as will be effective in restraining our citizens from committing such outrages, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who are hereby required to inquire into and report upon the expediency of the repeal or modification of said act of 20th of April, 1818, with power to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I accept the modification.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire, with the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] to say but a word; and that is, that the resolution, as now written, obviates the objection that I entertained to it when I addressed the committee before. The Judiciary Committee are required, by the resolution, as it now stands, to "inquire into and report," and that is the usual form.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The resolution is exactly in the shape in which I put it before the gentleman made his remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not so understand it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Well, it is all right now.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was about to express a hope, sir, when I was interrupted, that as I believed there were no "niggers" in Nicaragua, none would be brought into the discussion of this question in this House.

A MEMBER. They are all niggers there.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am told they are all negroes; but I believe there are no domestic slaves there; or if there are, we certainly have not anything to do with them. I trust that this question, which we must all see and know is one of great and grave import to the country, will be suffered to stand and be discussed upon its own intrinsic merits. The Kansas question and the Utah question will, of course, occupy our attention, and will receive very full and, I am happy to believe, most able and earnest discussion from gentlemen who are very well able to discuss it. But this question, I hope, will be allowed to stand and be discussed by itself, separated from the various other subjects to which I have alluded.

I rose, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of expressing a hope that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] will adhere to his amendment proposing to refer this subject to a special committee instead of the Committee on the Judiciary. I mean this subject that relates to the recent events that have transpired, as we learn through the public prints, at Punta Arenas. In making this suggestion and expressing this hope, I trust that I shall not be supposed to entertain any disrespect to the Committee on the Judiciary, all of whom are men fully able to discuss and consider and apprehend this or any other subject that we may think proper to submit to them. But this question is one of great importance, not only to us here as the Representatives of the people to inquire into and consider, but to the people themselves.

I trusted that there would be a special committee to which this matter would be referred for a further reason. The distinguished member from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] is a representative man—if I may be permitted to use the expression—representing a large and important portion of the public sentiment of the country. Whether that sentiment be right or wrong, proper or improper, just or unjust, perhaps it is not necessary for us now to consider; certainly it would not be proper for me to express an opinion on that point. I trusted, sir, that this subject might come under the cognizance and supervision of the distinguished gentleman, and that we might have the benefit, and the country might have the benefit of his investigation of a question, which, it strikes me, is of great importance to all the citizens of the country.

I must be permitted, in this connection, to suggest that I am not ready here and now, in this early, hasty, premature way, to stand in my place and express disapprobation of the conduct of the naval officers of our country. They belong to a most honorable and glorious profession. They have, in times past, done deeds of honor and immortal glory, thrilling with delight our hearts even in childhood, as we read them. I cannot here censure them, at least until we have fully the facts of the case. I believe, from what we have heard and from what we have seen, from the documents, official and unofficial, before us, that when we have all the facts before us, if there is blame to be attached, it will certainly not fall there.

We had submitted to us, the first day of the session, the message of the President of the United States. That distinguished functionary, in the course of his message, makes the following declaration:

"When it was first rendered probable that an attempt would be made to get up another unlawful expedition against Nicaragua, the Secretary of State issued instructions to the marshals and district attorneys, which were directed by the Secretaries of War and Navy to the appropriate Army and Navy officers, requiring them to be vigilant, and to use their best exertions in carrying into effect the provisions of the act of 1818. Notwithstanding these precautions, the expedition has escaped from our shores."

He states this as a matter of fact. What that expedition was which escaped from our shores, there can be no doubt or hesitation in determining.

Then, he says, "the leader of that expedition was arrested at New Orleans, but was discharged," &c. Who that leader was, I suppose, nobody has or ever did have any doubt. This, sir, comes from headquarters; it comes from the chief Executive of the nation himself, and it came to this House on the 7th day of December last.

In looking into the conduct and correspondence of Captains Paulding and Chatard, I take it for granted, from the tone and style which pervades the composition, that they had, or, at least, thought they had, ample instructions to justify them in the course they thought proper to pursue. Well, sir, if they had—if they were acting under instructions of that character from the Government—are gentlemen here now to reproach them, and condemn them for what they have done?

I may be permitted to observe, in passing, that although I have no personal acquaintance with that distinguished commander who has been the subject of these reproaches, citizen of my own State though he was, and though I have never seen him, or had any communication or correspondence with him, directly or indirectly, it does strike me that one of the most noble and glorious acts of his life—one which should entitle him to our highest consideration as a noble and magnanimous man—was that very act in which, when he saw the power of his country arrayed against him—when he saw the stripes no longer the banner of his protection, but the signal for his arrest—he bowed in submission to that power, and yielded himself, ready and willing to go where and when that power might determine or decide. He came and submitted himself at the feet of the chief Executive. For that act, if for no other act of his life, I would look upon him as a man of honor and spirit—as a good citizen, certainly not deserving the reprobation which has been heaped upon him in many quarters.

But, sir, supposing these facts are all so; suppose it be as the Chief Magistrate assumes; suppose instructions were issued, as we can suppose they were issued, to our naval commanders; then the question arises which I understand constitutes the difference between the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] and some of the other gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject. They say these high functionaries were not protected by the law, as it now stands upon the statute-book; and I am constrained to say, that, according to my humble judgment, from the examination I have been able to give the subject, they were protected by the law of 1818, to which the President makes allusion in his message, if the facts warrant its application.

Section six provides:

"That if any person within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States begin, or provide, or prepare the means, for any military expedition, or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding three thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than three years."

Such an expedition, we are told by the President, had been actually fitted out, and had escaped from our shores. Then, sir, these being the facts, what was the duty of the President in the execution of the laws of the country? By the eighth section, which has been referred to by my friend from Virginia, it is provided:

"That, in every case in which a vessel shall be fitted out and armed, or attempted to be fitted out and armed, or in which the force of any vessel of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, shall be increased or augmented, or in which any military expedition or enterprise shall be begun or set on foot, contrary to the provisions and prohibitions of this act; and in every case of the capture of a ship or vessel, within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States, as heretofore defined, and in every case in which any process issuing out of any court of the United States shall be disobeyed, or resisted, by any person or persons having the custody of any vessel of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, or of any subjects or citizens of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, in every such case it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States against the territories or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace."

And then arise the great questions which were argued with so much force by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] whether that law should stand as part and parcel of our legislation; whether it ought to remain upon our statute-book; whether our citizens ought to be prevented from carrying on private and personal enterprises, provided they do not involve their country in hostile relations with other nations? With this view of the case, understanding these things as I do, I will renew the motion made by the member from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] that this portion of the message be referred to a special select committee. And I will do it for the additional reason that we are obliged, from the nature of the case, to have such a committee.

Yesterday, on motion of the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] which was modified by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] and another gentleman, whom I do not now see in his place, [Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky,] the President was called on to communicate to this House complete information on this subject. When that information is communicated to us, it seems to me that we will have a volume of matter peculiarly appropriate to be referred to a select committee to examine and report on it for the action of this House—for action it will unquestionably have. And I would ask the gentleman from Mississippi to adhere to that part of his amendment for a reference of this subject to a special committee instead of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. QUITMAN. I am committed, of course, to the amendment to my amendment suggested by the gentleman from Georgia. I cannot recede from my acceptance of that modification, but I would suggest that the gentleman can take the sense of the House on this question by moving an amendment to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia has been accepted by the gentleman from Mississippi, and is a part of his amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move, then, that the subject be referred to a special committee, as it was provided in the original proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Mr. Chairman, I want to protest against the force which it seems to me we are acting in this House. If our neutrality laws need any change, I am willing to vote for that change; but it does strike me that that subject ought to be considered apart from the individual case which is now being discussed. Gentlemen utter their sentiments, they say, in advance. Well, sir, I protest against this attempt to elevate a buccaneer, a marauder, a pirate, who has been disturbing the peace of neighboring nations for years, (for which fact we have in substance the authority of the President himself,) into a martyr. Walker is a fugitive from justice, escaping under bail the penal laws of his country, and we are now to bow in admiration to the heroism, the glory, and the magnanimity of a criminal for yielding himself up to an officer of justice. There is a great deal of this kind of magnanimity when a man cannot help it. It has been done before, and is being done in New York every day under its police arrangements. And, sir, if we have to admire every such individual, we will entirely exhaust our power of admiration.

Sir, if he shall meet the due reward of his deeds, where shall we find admiration adequate to the occasion when he is tried by our courts, and sentenced and doomed to the felon's death he has so richly merited, and he moves from the criminal's box to the dungeon? Then, sir, you must squeeze up your admiration still higher at the wonderful magnanimity of this robber yielding unresistingly to the power of manacles. But the grand finale is to come; the proudest moment of his career is to come; the climacteric of his glory is now to be attained! And when the act is passed, we shall hear gentlemen, with a pathos that thumps on the heart like a trip-hammer, portraying the scene. We shall hear how gracefully Bill Walker, the pirate, moved towards the gallows; how heroically he met his fate; with what majestic tread he took his stand upon the dead fall! And ah! when the knot shall have been adjusted—our admiration all gone—with an overwhelming emotive power of veneration, we shall have to prostrate ourselves on the very earth, and look up admiringly to the dangling buccaneer! Sir, my admiration will go forth towards the sheriff, and not to the criminal.

If Commodore Paulding had performed this service, and hung him at the yard-arm of his ship after he had arrested him, I would have honored him even more than I do now. That would have been justice, summary to be sure, but such as pirates ought to have dealt out to them.

Now, sir, when this subject comes up on its merits, if it is necessary, I am willing to discuss it; but I am not willing that even this preliminary debate should go out to the people with no voice of protest against this idea of clothing a man with heroism, and making him a martyr, when he is simply a rascal. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter into this discussion, but I do desire, if I can, to understand the position occupied by the gentlemen upon the other side. I understand the gentleman from Georgia to argue, that inasmuch as there is no special power, according to his construction of the neutrality act, conferred upon the President to arrest parties on the high seas charged with the violation of that act, therefore no such power exists.

I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia, and of those who agree with him in opinion, whether they hold to the doctrine that any man charged with the violation of the criminal laws of the United States for piracy, murder, or what not, who once escapes beyond the marine league, is therefore exempt from all arrest, prosecution, trial, and conviction? I do not. I have not examined this question; and I do not know that my conception or understanding of it is accurate. I understand the settled rule of international law to be, that every nation has the right to pursue its criminals upon the high seas, and to arrest them wherever found under its flag, or without a violation to the flag of another nation; and I understand further, that if any nation pursues a criminal into the waters, bays, or harbors of any foreign nation, and arrests him there; if criminals are pursued, and arrested upon the shores, or within the jurisdiction of another nation, it is all right, subject only to such acknowledgments and satisfactions as may be due to the nation whose territory was invaded.

Now take a case. I understand that upon the Canada border it is by no means uncommon for an executive officer, in possession of criminal process, to step over the boundary line a rod, or a mile, if you please, and to arrest and bring back fugitives from justice. I learn, too, in the case referred to by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCOCK,] that Baker was pursued and arrested on the high seas, under some sort of process, I do not know what, and no complaint has been made about it. There is no want of power in the executive department to arrest fugitives from justice, wherever they may be, subject to any amends which they are bound to make to the nation whose territory is violated. Now, what have we here? Here is a party indicted for a violation of the criminal laws of the United States. He escapes beyond your jurisdiction. He is out of reach of the ordinary process of the courts of the country. The question is whether, in such a case, the executive power of the Government is not authorized to go upon the high seas and arrest this party, wherever found; or whether the high seas is a great sanctuary where crime is protected, and where it cannot be interfered with without a violation of the rights of the criminal.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman tell me by what law the President of the United States has the right to arrest any person charged with crime when he is under bail?

Mr. STANTON. I apprehend that there is no difficulty in the world in arresting a party who has given bail, and the condition of the bail-bond is broken.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman to assert the fact that the condition of the bail-bond of General Walker is broken?

Mr. STANTON. I do not know how it is.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I understand the gentleman to say there is no power to arrest where the individual charged with the offense has given bail. Now, I ask the gentleman if Commodore Paulding, or Captain Chatard, or the President of the United States, or any other man, has any right to assume a man under bail to be guilty of any offense?

Mr. STANTON. I understand the condition of a party who is out on bail, and who is indicted for a criminal charge, to be, that he is, in legal contemplation, in the custody of his bail. The bail has control of his person; but if a party out at bail once forfeits his bail-bond, there is no doubt about the power of the court to issue further process of arrest. And I go even further: If the bail-bond is not technically broken, but the party is found in such a situation, and at a point so distant from the place where he is bound to appear as to render his return, in obedience to his bond, impossible, I apprehend that it will be no invasion of the right of the party to arrest him before a technical breach of the bond, and to bring him within the jurisdiction where he is bound to appear.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Has the President any more authority to do it than you have?

Mr. STANTON. As to the question how far the Executive may do a judicial act under process from a judicial tribunal, there may be some little difficulty, perhaps. But I want to go on with the interrogatory. It is the ordinary practice, when fugitives from justice have escaped, and taken refuge in a foreign jurisdiction, where they come within the jurisdiction of foreign treaties, to make a requisition upon the foreign Government for their surrender. Very well; you send your messenger or agent. He is an executive, and not a judicial, agent. He goes under the authority of the President of the United States. By virtue of the treaty, he receives the fugitive from the executive department of the foreign Government, and takes him into the custody of the executive. He is surrendered, say in England, and put on board an American vessel. Now, if the gentleman's theory is sound, when that vessel is a league from the English shore, I want to know by what authority the criminal is held? Sir, it is not true, and cannot be true, under international law, that there is no authority to hold a party who has committed a crime, upon the high seas.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Does the gentleman put that as a case analogous to the one under discussion?

Mr. STANTON. I do. Now I wish the gentleman to answer the question, and to answer it now, and that is: Does he hold that there is no power to arrest a fugitive upon the high seas?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I say there is power to arrest a fugitive; but I say that there is no evidence in this case we are speaking about, of the party being a fugitive from justice. As to the case which the gentleman puts, of an individual guilty of a breach of criminal law, and charged with its violation, who escapes into another country with which we have an extradition treaty, we have the right to send an agent there and demand, not by the law of nations, but by the treaty, that such individual should be delivered up, and he would be bound outside of the marine league, and would have to come.

But that is not at all analogous to this case. I have been arguing this case upon the ground that there is no criminal offense, no criminal conviction in any court, and no agent sent out to arrest a criminal. It is all suspicion. Now, the law of 1818 authorizes the President, within a marine league, without judicial proceeding, before indictment, upon evidence before an officer of the Government that an expedition is about leaving the coast, to order out the Army and Navy of the United States to suppress such expedition, and to bring it in to answer the charges which may be brought against it. That is my understanding of the law. But, if a party, without the commission of crime gets beyond that limit, the President has no power to issue his letters to arrest and bring him here for trial. Having done such an act, Commodore Paulding acted without law. I cannot believe—I repeat, I do not believe the President ever gave such a power. Such is my confidence in the good sense, in the wisdom, and in the patriotism of the President of the United States, that I cannot entertain even a suspicion of his having given such an order to Commodore Paulding. His past does not allow me to doubt him on such a question as that. Hence, Commodore Paulding acted without authority of law. That is my argument. In other words, when you look at the naked act, it was nothing in the world but kidnapping.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from Georgia, as I suppose, does not claim as a legal proposition, that fugitives from justice may not be arrested upon the high seas. He admits it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I admit it under process of law, but not without. The Constitution of the United States—the magna charta of our rights, upon which I stand—declares that no man shall be arrested or put in jeopardy, but by due process of law. That is the ground I stand upon. The Constitution has laid down the principle that no man shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the law of the land and the judgment of his peers.

Mr. STANTON. Does the gentleman hold that the marshal of the southern district of New York can extend his territorial limits as marshal, all over the high seas? Is it a criminal process issuing from a court in the hands of a municipal officer of the court, with which he may go over the whole of God's footstool upon the high seas? If not so, then an arrest upon the high seas must be made by the Executive Department of the Government.

Now, what says the President? He says that this expedition of Walker has escaped, and it was upon the ground that it had escaped from our shores, that this arrest was made.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose now, because I think that it would be premature to do so, to go into any question as to whether the President was authorized, or not authorized; or whether Commodore Paulding acted in obedience to his instructions or not. The information upon which this House should act is not now before us. All I desired when I rose was to ascertain distinctly from gentlemen upon the other side whether they did absolutely take the ground that a party who had escaped from our shores, and beyond a marine league, was exempted from further pursuit.

Mr. QUITMAN. I will answer for myself, and my answer is that neither the President of the United States, nor any officer thereof, has a right to make arrests unless there is a law of Congress authorizing it.

Mr. STANTON. I had supposed myself that the executive department of every Government, in its international relations and in the exercise of its sovereignty over the high seas, if you please, had certain general powers recognized by the laws of nations, and that it was not dependent upon special acts of Congress for every exercise of political power.

Mr. QUITMAN. I have but a few words to say upon that subject. The gentleman's position amounts to this, that the Executive of the United States has not only legislative, but judicial powers; for both must be brought into exercise to enable him to strip a citizen or any man of his right to liberty.

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman from Mississippi answer a question?

Mr. QUITMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAVAGE. I am disposed to think that this debate has gone far enough.

Mr. STANTON. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Mississippi. I understand him to say that unless there is an act of Congress giving special authority to the President to exercise a certain power, he ought not to exercise it, or has no right to do it. Now, if I understood him in his remarks to-day, and in the resolution which he offered the other day, he seeks, by an act of Congress, to deprive the President of the power that he now has. Does he desire that there shall be no power in any Department of the Government by act of Congress (and he says there is none now) to arrest criminals who have found a refuge on the high seas?

Mr. QUITMAN. I hold to no such opinion, sir, but I hold to this opinion, that the Executive, by virtue of his executive power, cannot arrest, nor can he imprison, a citizen in any case, unless the legislative authority has given him express authority so to do. The gentleman seems to think that there is something in the executive power going beyond the Constitution and the laws. We have divided the departments of this Government distinctly, and have forbidden each to assume the duties and rights of another, and I hold that the Executive has no power of arresting and imprisoning, either upon the high seas or upon the territory of the United States, except that which is vested in him by act of Congress. I seek not to deprive him of any powers that are necessary for the purpose of carrying out our proper obligations of neutrality to other countries. I seek, however, to protect the constitutional rights of the citizen from violation or from invasion, especially from executive power.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the committee do now rise. I think this debate has progressed far enough.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion to allow me to make a statement.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw it.

Mr. SICKLES, and several other members. No, no; hold on to the motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. STANTON. Very well; I will insist on my motion, as it seems to be the wish of the committee.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman has already yielded the floor to me, and I have been recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Ohio, in response to the appeal made to him, to withdraw the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. SICKLES. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I merely wish to suggest, what seems to be the universal sentiment of the committee, that this is not the time nor the place to discuss this question. When the President responds to the resolution of inquiry adopted yesterday, all the facts will then be before the House, and the question will come up regularly for debate. I wish, therefore, that before the committee rise they would pass this resolution, and pass on to some other, as this question will come up in proper order at an early day.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Allow me to suggest, that there are many things in the message that the committees of the House ought to act on, and I do hope that it will be speedily referred to them. This question can then be discussed when the information which we have called for comes in, or it can be discussed upon an appropriation bill, but it is absolutely necessary that the message should be sent to the proper committees, as otherwise they cannot act upon any of the President's recommendations. I hope that, by common consent, the question will now be taken on this resolution.

Mr. STANTON. I think the message ought not to be taken out of committee yet. There are other subjects embraced in it that ought to be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. SICKLES obtained the floor.

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman yield for a motion to rise?

Mr. SICKLES. I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. GROW. Then, sir, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. PHELPS] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the annual report from the Coast Survey.

Ordered, That said report lie upon the table and be printed.

Mr. MILES. I offer the usual resolution for the printing of extra copies of that report in order that it may be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution, which was referred under the rule, to the Joint Committee on Printing, was read, and is as follows:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury communicating the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1857, in addition to the usual number, be printed, six thousand for the use of the House and the remainder for distribution by the Coast Survey Office; and that the same be printed and bound with the plates, in quarto form, and that the printing of said plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

On motion of Mr. GROW, the House then (at a quarter before four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. R. S. BITTINGER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented the petition of Joseph Reynes, praying for the confirmation of his title to certain lands in the State of Louisiana, claimed under a Spanish grant, and to be indemnified for such lands embraced in his claim as may have been sold by the United States as public land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also presented the petition of Camille St. Amant and others, praying for the confirmation of entries of land made by them in Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of the children of Polly Colgrove, praying for authority to locate or assign a land warrant to which their mother was entitled; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SEWARD. I also present the petition of Mary Elizabeth Larnard, widow of Major Charles H. Larnard, late of the United States Army, who was drowned while in the actual performance of his duty as an officer of the United States, at Fort Snelling, praying for a pension. It appears that some correspondence has been had with the Department on the subject, and that the laws of the United States do not provide any relief in the case. As it is one of exceeding merit, I beg leave to commend it to the careful attention of the Committee on Pensions. I move that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of Robert Carter, a passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, praying to be allowed his pay as a passed assistant surgeon from the time he was entitled to his examination to that at which his examination took place; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MASON. I have received a memorial from Thomas G. Clinton, dated at Washington city, addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives, in which he prays that a law may be passed, at the proper time, to increase the salary of the President of the United States. The memorial is respectful in its terms. I do not know what appropriate interest the memorialist has in the subject, but I have thought it proper to present the paper to the Senate; nor do I know to what committee it should be referred. I move, therefore, that for the present it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOOMBS presented the petition of William Y. Hansell, William H. Underwood, and the executor of Samuel Rockwell, deceased, praying for compensation for services in negotiating the treaty of 1835, with the Cherokee Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Eliza A. Merchant, widow of Charles G. Merchant, late of the Army, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Marblehead, Massachusetts, praying that the provisions of the bounty land law of March 3, 1855, may be extended to the privateersmen of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SIMMONS presented the petition of Edwin M. Chaffee, praying for an extension of his patent for preparing India rubber and applying it without the use of a solvent; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. KING presented the petition of the heirs-at-law of Aaron Childs, deceased; the petition of Emily J. West, widow of Joseph West, deceased; the petition of George Stow; the petition of the heir-at-law of David Reese, deceased; the petition of Silas Hopkins; the petition of Frances E. Lay and Mary Atkins, heirs-at-law of Eli Hart, deceased; the petition of the administrator of John Latta, deceased; the petition of the executor of Isaac Colt, deceased; the petition of the heirs-at-law of Martin Daley, deceased; the petition of the heirs-at-law of Elisha Ensign, deceased; and the petition of Polly Hoyt, widow of Joseph D. Hoyt, deceased; praying indemnity for property destroyed by the enemy on the Niagara frontier in the war of 1812; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BROWN. I present the memorial of A. L. Bleecker and his associates, praying that the Postmaster General may be authorized to contract with them for the conveyance of the mails between Panama and Valparaiso. I present the memorial because I am requested to do so, and not because I approve its object. I move its reference to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

It was so referred.

Mr. BROWN also presented the petition of Frances Cato, widow of Burrell Cato, a soldier in the revolutionary war, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. IVERSON presented the petition of Thomas E. Williams, praying to be allowed additional compensation for the time he was employed as superintendent of the saw-mill at the Washington navy-yard; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON. I present a memorial from the Common Council of the city of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the location of the post office in that city in the building purchased from the Bank of Pennsylvania. I am informed that there were fifty-six members of the Common Council present when this memorial was signed, and that fifty-three of them signed it.

I am also requested to present one hundred and six memorials, signed by many thousands of the citizens of Philadelphia, who remonstrate against this location of the post office. Some gentlemen of Philadelphia have desired me to say that more than forty thousand names have been presented to the Post Office Department against the location, and the Postmaster General has consented to withhold operations for the present. It is therefore desirable that this matter should be acted on as soon as possible by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which I move that these memorials be referred.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, presented additional papers in support of the claim of William Moss; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented a memorial of the register and receiver of the land office at Helena, Arkansas, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PUGH presented the petition of Hugh Ferguson and James Robb, representing that they have not received the quantity of bounty land to which they are justly entitled, and praying that it may be allowed to them; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Portsmouth, Ohio, praying that a national bank may be chartered, the revenue laws so adjusted as to raise sufficient for the expenses of the Government and yield protection to labor and capital, and that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands may be divided among the States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BRODERICK presented the petition of J. W. Sullivan, praying for indemnity for losses caused by the repeated failure of the mail between New Orleans and San Francisco; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SIMMONS, it was Ordered, That the petition of Alexander Keef, and the petition of Joseph Chase, Dartmoor prisoners, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. BIGLER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Rachel Posey, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, it was

On motion of Mr. BROWN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Sallie Eola Reneau, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. DURKEE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the legal representatives of James Bell, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

REPORT ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings be printed for the use of the Commissioner.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BIGLER, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of W. S. Munday, J. Knox Walker, and others, with reference to the protection of a mail route through Arizona, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of Nathaniel Champe, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James Hudgins, administrator of Mrs. Ruth Murphy, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. SEWARD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the acts which regulate the registry and license of vessels, so as to relieve the owners of vessels constructed chiefly to navigate canals, but which also enter into tide water.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. PUGH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to bring in a bill (S. No. 46) to grant the right of preemption in certain lands to the Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HUNTER. I perceive that I have been appointed a member of the select committee on the French spoliation bill. I have so much committee service imposed on me this year that I am constrained to ask the Senate to excuse me from service on that committee. Some one should be put on it who is not very much engaged in committee service.

Mr. TOOMBS. I also wish to put in my own petition to the same effect. I have been connected a good deal with this class of claims, and have voted for them. I think I have examined them sufficiently. I am much engaged in committee service, and I join in the request of the Senator from Virginia to be excused from service on this special committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must put the questions to the Senate separately. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator from Virginia will not be excused, unless all of us who have a good deal of committee work shall be excused also. The end of this motion, if carried, will be that you cannot raise a select committee at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I also hope that the Senate will not excuse the honorable Senator from Virginia for the reason given. There has been, as I know from my connection with the matter, very considerable difficulty in getting a select committee on this subject, all the members of the Senate having so much business to attend to. The committee has been carefully made up of honorable gentlemen who are favorable, and those also who are opposed, to the measure. I think that if the Senators who make this request will consider the matter for a moment, they will be induced to withdraw it, for the simple reason that the subject has been so thoroughly investigated, there are so many reports in regard to it, and the minds of Senators, as a general rule, are so thoroughly informed, that no very particular investigation can now be required. All these Senators have examined the subject before, and come to their conclusions upon it. The business of drawing a report, if any is necessary, will devolve on the chairman. The difficulty that will arise, will be that whoever may be appointed to fill the places of the Senators may also request to be excused, and the Senate will find considerable difficulty in filling them. I do not believe it will add to the labors of gentlemen on the committee any further than the slight labor of attending a meeting or two previous to their making a report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from Virginia from service on the select committee in reference to the French spoliation claims?

The question was decided in the negative; and the Senator was not excused.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from Georgia from service on the same committee?

The question was decided in the negative; and he was not excused.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. CRITTENDEN, on December 19, 1857, and postponed to this day:

Resolved by the Senate, That in consideration of the financial condition of the country and its industrial interests, as well as of the wants and embarrassments of the Treasury of the United States, the rates of duty levied under the tariff act of the 3d of March, 1857, ought to be materially increased.

Resolved further, That experience having demonstrated that the present mode of ascertaining the dutiable value of imported goods is productive of monstrous frauds, injurious alike to the Government and the honest importer, a system of home valuation ought to be immediately substituted therefor.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, I do not propose, upon this occasion, at all to enter into anything like an elaborate discussion of the subjects embraced in these resolutions. They contain propositions of a character so distinct and obvious in their purposes, that but little is necessary to be said to place them fully within the comprehension of the Senate.

Since these resolutions were introduced, we have passed a bill authorizing the issuing of $20,000,000 of Treasury notes within one year. It strikes me that it is necessary and wise for us, at the same time that we create this demand of $20,000,000 upon the Treasury, to provide the means of payment. It is a very easy thing to contract debt; it is a very easy thing to supply the Treasury of the United States by such means as these; but if we are not careful always to provide for their redemption in proper time, we are in danger of being seduced before we know it and are sensible of it, to the delay and postponement of measures proper in such an exigency; and we are thus in great danger of finding ourselves involved in debt beyond our means of payment.

The first proposition contained in the resolutions is, that we ought now to increase the revenue of the country in order to be prepared to meet this demand on the Treasury which we are creating in the form of Treasury notes. This depends on another question; and that is whether there is any probability that the revenue of the country, according to law, will furnish the means at the appointed time of paying these debts? It seems to me entirely too sanguine to suppose that the present revenue laws will produce an adequate amount. I see that the Secretary of the Treasury has furnished us with such information as induces the belief that he supposes the loss on this year's revenue will be at least $30,000,000. That is the opinion of a very distinguished financial gentleman to whom he has applied for information. In other words, he computes that the loss, during the present year, will be one half the ordinary amount of revenue, (which is about sixty or seventy million dollars,) making the loss, according to his estimate, at least $30,000,000. We have issued $20,000,000 of Treasury notes. If this fact be assumed, it is a demonstration at once that nothing will be furnished to pay these $20,000,000; indeed, that these $20,000,000 will not suffice to pay the expenses of the year, and that we shall be called on in the end either for a loan or for another issue of Treasury notes to defray the expenses of the Government. Instead of accumulating anything beyond current expenses, we shall be falling short in our revenue of current expenses, and a balance will be against us in addition to the $20,000,000.

Under these circumstances, I cannot suppose that there can be any controversy as to the necessity of our providing the means of payment. The revenue ought to be increased. We congratulate ourselves that, though it has been necessary to issue Treasury notes—a course of supply generally unacceptable to the country and to Congress—yet at this time it may not be without its advantages in forming a currency and aiding the country out of its present financial difficulties—not the Government merely, but the country—and adding so much to its general currency. That I confess has reconciled me much to the measure.

Now, sir, if it be necessary, having created this debt to provide an additional revenue for its payment, how is that to be done? It is by increasing the duties on imports. That is our mode of supply; our mode of taxation. Nobody proposes direct taxation. We must do it by a tax on foreign commerce. How? By what sort of duties is it to be done? My proposition is a general one that it must be done by an increase of duties on foreign commerce; and how are those duties to be imposed? I should fain hope upon such articles as, while they furnish the necessary revenue, will revive to some extent the industry of the country and aid our manufacturers in resuming that business which is fast falling into ruin in every part of the land. If we were to increase by only five per cent. the duties on cotton and woolen goods, this small addition to our revenue would be sufficient, I apprehend, to afford all the protection which is necessary. I do not wish gentlemen to understand that I am now advocating a system of protection. I believe it is necessary to raise the revenue, and I only ask that that revenue may be raised by such a distribution of duties on imported articles as to give a fair and reasonable incidental protection to the labor of our own country.

Surely, sir, the labor of the country never more required encouragement than it does now. We hear of the failure of princely and wealthy merchants and manufacturers throughout the country. They deserve our sympathy; but there is another class far more numerous and far more important to the general welfare of the country, who are suffering more, but whose sufferings are unseen and unheard to a great extent by us. They are that great class of laborers who have been turned out of employment for the want of ability on the part of their former employers longer to engage their services. I had a casual conversation with a gentleman in Philadelphia, as I passed through that city in coming to this place, who told me of a painful scene through which he had just passed. He said he found himself unable to carry on his iron works in Pennsylvania, and had just returned from discharging all his workmen. I asked him how many he had discharged. He replied seventeen hundred—he paid them the last cent which he owed them and discharged them. They clung around him begging him to retain them in service, saying that they would credit him for their wages if he could pay only enough for them to live on. He told them, "I cannot continue to employ you without ruining myself and without deceiving you; I cannot continue this work and give you any employment or pay you anything; it is better for both that we part; I close my works and will pay you off every cent I owe you." When he went to Philadelphia, he said he sent them sixty barrels of flour for a present subsistence.

Sir, this is but one instance of the thousands that are occurring throughout the North. Thousands upon thousands have been and are being discharged from their only means of subsistence—that labor which constitutes at last the wealth of the country, and is the great producer. We are anxious and endeavoring to improve the currency of the country; but, sir, the labor of the country is of infinitely more importance, of vastly more consequence. This demand presents itself to us in a living form; a form that calls on us not merely to study some system of policy; but requires our sympathies and regards as men. We want the revenue, which, if rightly and judiciously levied, will furnish these men employment, perhaps, and settle them again to their labor. Is it not the interest of the country to do this? I perceive that, in Rhode Island, there has been a discontinuance of manufactures to a great extent, accompanied by the discharge of multitudes of workmen; and I have seen a clear, demonstrative estimate of the actual loss of the productive labor which has been discharged there, and now goes starving and unemployed. It is said that this reduction of labor diminishes the product at the rate of $278,000 per week. This is a consideration which, it seems to me, demands our attention.

I beg gentlemen not to believe that I am standing here for the purpose of advocating protection in the ancient form, in which it was the subject of so much controversy here. I know that would be in vain. The doctrine of a high tariff with specific duties is abandoned. I intend to revive no controversy about it. The question now presents itself whether we will study to afford an incidental protection, growing out of the revenue which we actually require to be collected for the use of the Government. By the last tariff act, the duties on cottons and woollens were reduced, I believe, to nineteen per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Cottons to nineteen and woollens to twenty-four per cent.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The duty on iron was also largely reduced. But, sir, I will not enter into particulars here on this subject. I make these remarks as general as the resolution itself. It will be time enough to go into details when the principle shall have been adopted.

So much for the first resolution. The second proposes that we shall exchange the present mode of valuation by the foreign market price of the article, for a home valuation of the imported article. On this question experience is our best guide. I have not yet had time to read the report of the present Secretary of the Treasury, but I know that Mr. Guthrie, and that Mr. Guthrie's predecessor, and that the predecessor of that predecessor, have all admonished Congress of the great frauds that were practiced on the revenue by this foreign valuation, and Congress have been appealed to to provide a remedy against it. I do not believe that any adequate or efficient remedy can be provided. As long as the system of foreign valuation is continued, and made the criterion of the amount of duties to be paid, there will be frauds. If there had been any remedy it could have been devised by regulations which the Departments were authorized to make. They have been able to make none. All the regulations which they have made, or can make, are in effect nullified by the custom-house perjury that is used for the purpose of evasion. The foreign market is appealed to; the oath of the importer is appealed to, and you have no test at hand by which it can be controverted. A home valuation will protect the commerce of the country. It will give the honest American merchant a fair competition with the foreign merchant who avails himself of his superior means of evading our revenue laws, by underrating and undervaluing his goods. I believe no country has ever had a body of mercantile men more honorable than the American merchants of this country; and their general integrity, considering the number of those who have been employed in the commerce of the country, has been signal and honorable to their country. But these honorable men who give the value of their goods fairly, and pay the proper legal duties, are placed at great disadvantage with their competitors of a different character, who avail themselves of the multiplied evasions which the present mode of valuation affords them.

I hope, sir, that this general proposition will meet the acceptance of the Senate. I know that there are, or have been supposed to be, great difficulties in adopting a system of home valuation which would preserve equality of duties in all the different ports and places of collection in the United States—an equality required by the Constitution. I think we could, without much difficulty, if there were a general disposition to do so, adopt a system of home valuation which would come much nearer to equality of duties in all the ports of the United States than the system of foreign valuation, admitting of so much evasion and so much fraud. These frauds and evasions constitute inequalities between the different ports of the United States much greater than would arise out of a system of home valuation fairly and judiciously made. It does not seem to me to be very difficult. Though I profess to be practically altogether unacquainted with such subjects, I cannot conceive that there can be any great difficulty, if there be a general disposition to do so, in adopting some system which will not violate this equality between the different harbors and different portions of the Union. It is sufficient now to say this, merely to suggest my ideas on the subject. All the particulars and details which the system may require will be for consideration hereafter, when the resolutions shall have been approved.

I do not intend, sir, to detain the Senate on this subject. I did not come here to make a speech. I came to suggest these measures for the consideration of the Senate, and to take their sense upon them. As I said at first, the resolutions are of a character so distinct and so obvious, that if they are maintainable at all, it requires no argument to sustain them. I think our revenue requires the measure; I think the condition of the labor of the country may be benefited by it, and that labor requires all the encouragement and all the assistance which we can constitutionally and properly afford it, at this time of its great prostration and great distress. I hope that the resolutions will be adopted.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to follow the Senator from Kentucky into the very interesting questions of inquiry which he has suggested. The subject to which his resolutions mainly refer—that of altering the existing tariff—is one upon which original legislation can only be had in the House of Representatives. In regard to the other matters—the causes of the present distress, the true means of remedying them, if any can be suggested, or the true species of legislation which Congress shall apply to them—it will be time enough to speak of them when the opinion of Congress begins to develop itself in some practical form. For that reason, sir, (declining to follow him in regard to these various matters which he has suggested with reference to a system of home valuation, which connects itself intimately with the subject of the tariff, until the time when it shall come up, should it come up at all,) I shall content myself simply with moving for the present to lay the resolutions upon the table. If any Senator should desire to speak to them or to call them up, he can do so on a simple motion. A majority can call them up at any time. I now move to lay them on the table.

Mr. FITCH. With the permission of the Senator from Virginia, I should like to move amendments to the resolutions before the question on his motion is taken, with no view to embarrass or defeat the passage of the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky, but for the purpose of placing before the Senate my own views in relation to another manner of raising a revenue.

Mr. HUNTER. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BELL. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Virginia if he holds that it would be incompetent for the Senate to initiate any measure for preventing the frauds alleged to have been practiced under our present system of valuation, at the port whence the goods are exported to this country. Does he think that conflicts with the Constitution in any form?

Mr. HUNTER. I do not.

Mr. BELL. I should like to ask the Senator a further question: whether, as far as he is informed, any plan is likely to be proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, or whether he himself contemplates bringing forward any measure of that nature; assuming it as a fact that the revenues have been defrauded to a very considerable extent by that feature in our revenue system. I should like, for my own personal gratification, to know whether he contemplates any such measure at an early day.

Mr. HUNTER. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that I am not aware as to what are the intentions of the Secretary of the Treasury on that subject. I certainly contemplate bringing in no measure to change the present system of ad valorem valuations. I believe that, in general, it is the proper system. I do not assume as a fact, as the Senator from Tennessee does, that it is more liable to fraud than a system founded on a home valuation. On the contrary, I think, when the subject comes to be examined, it will be found that the latter would lead to more inequality and injustice than the former, and would be equally open to fraud. If the Senator from Tennessee can show any means by which the present system may be made to act more fairly and justly, and be made more secure against fraud, I shall be happy to coöperate with him; but as to a general change, I differ in opinion with him, and with others. I do not believe that it would tend to suppress frauds to make any such change as that which he seems to prefer.

Mr. FITCH. My amendment is, to add to the first resolution, "and that all notes of banks of issue be taxed;" and to insert at the end of the second resolution, "and experience having demonstrated that the present issue of small notes by banks is injurious to the industrial interests of the country, a tax on bank notes should discriminate against those of small denominations." This may by some be regarded as an entirely distinct subject, and may possibly be considered as conflicting with that clause of the Constitution which prohibits the origination in this body of any revenue measure. That, however, is a matter for the decision of the Senate.

As I have already remarked, I have not offered this proposition with any view to embarrass the Senator from Kentucky; for no gentleman here will go further than I will with him in any proper act for the prevention of frauds upon the revenue; but, agreeing with the President, that the financial embarrassments of the country, from which we have not yet been extricated, have been produced mainly by our vicious system of State banking; I desire, if it be within the power of this Government—and to test the question, whether we have the power—to impose such a tax as shall discriminate against small notes and drive them from circulation. I am willing to go so far, even, as to tax larger notes, to an extent which will prevent their issue almost entirely.

Mr. CLAY. I move to lay the resolutions and amendments on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SELMA PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. CLAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 27,) to detach Selma, in the State of Alabama, from the collection district of New Orleans, and make it a port of delivery within the collection district of Mobile, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to consider and pass it at this time. It is merely to correct a clerical error in a bill passed at the last session, and is approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that I have any objection to the passage of this bill, unless it proposes to make a new port of entry or delivery. If it is to increase the ports of entry or delivery, I object to it, and should like to hear some explanation showing its necessity. I think we already have entirely too many of these ports.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that this bill does not create any new port of entry or delivery; but merely detaches a port of delivery created by an act of the last session of Congress from the district of New Orleans, to which it was improperly attached by a clerical error, and attaches it to the district of Mobile, to which it naturally and properly belongs, being on the Alabama river, immediately above Mobile.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it does not increase the ports of entry or delivery, and does not create additional officers, or involve additional expense, I have nothing to say about it.

Mr. CLAY. It does not.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

The motion to reconsider the vote adopting the resolution submitted by Mr. SLIDELL on the 22d of December last, was agreed to; and Mr. SLIDELL modified the resolution to read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate an abstract of the records of proceedings of the several naval courts of inquiry, organized under the act of Congress approved January 16, 1857, to amend an act entitled, "An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy."

Mr. BAYARD. I move to lay the resolution on the table, in order to enable me to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope it will not be laid on the table.

Mr. SLIDELL. I can probably dispense with the necessity of any further discussion on this subject, by stating that the Naval Committee have now in their possession all these records, and, therefore, the call is unnecessary. If, however, it should be necessary hereafter to call on the President for the purpose of making them known to the Senate generally, the resolution can then be taken up either here or in executive session.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then let this resolution lie over for the present. I desire to have this information, and probably I should prefer to have the call made in the form of this resolution, though I had intended to offer one myself. Let the resolution lie on the table for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will be passed over. The Chair hears no objection.

The resolution was accordingly laid on the table.

Mr. MALLORY, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 4) to extend the operation of the second section of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy;'" which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading. It extends the operation of the second section of the act of January 16, 1857, limiting the restoration of naval officers, in certain cases, to the 16th of April, 1858.

Mr. MALLORY. One word in explanation of the resolution. I will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the last amendatory act on naval reform limits the time of the restoration of officers to one year from the date of the bill then passed, which was the 16th of January last. The Naval Committee of this body, now having these matters under consideration, cannot possibly dispose of them by that time. They therefore ask the Senate to extend the time three months, which will probably be more than sufficient, as the committee will have frequent meetings, and will dispose of the cases as rapidly as possible; but to give the bill its due weight I ask the extension of the time to the 16th of April. I ask for the passage of the resolution now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does it come from a committee?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir; it comes from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask whether the time is not fixed by a law of Congress; and can a mere resolution extend it?

Mr. MALLORY. This is a joint resolution of both Houses.

The joint resolution was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida whether this is designed to extend at all the performance of any duties, or the opportunity to perform duties by these courts of inquiry, or whether it is simply designed for the purpose of enabling the committee to consider their reports?

Mr. MALLORY. It is designed exclusively to give the committee an opportunity to examine the results of the courts of inquiry. We cannot possibly do it by the 16th of this month.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see the necessity of allowing so long a time. I should like to have this matter out of the way. Will not thirty days be sufficient?

Mr. MALLORY. I have explained the object of the committee. If the words of the resolution do not accomplish it, I am willing to agree to an amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will this resolution have the effect of giving any further operation to any part of the arrangement except the action of the Senate? Is it for any more courts?

Mr. MALLORY. I infer not. I should object to it if it were. That is not the object.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like it to lie over for the present, in order that we may look at the matter.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I will ask that the resolution lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. HAMLIN. And be printed.

The motion to postpone was agreed to; and the joint resolution was ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by J. B. HENRY, Esq., his Secretary.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 6, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE W. BASSETT.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce joint resolutions of the State of Texas.

Mr. GROW. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the committees for reports.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending 30th of June, 1859; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion until the morning hour expires.

Mr. CLINGMAN. We can vote down the motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I shall ask for a vote on my motion, as I am anxious to have the President's message referred.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman has made his report, and now he seeks to prevent others from having the same privilege.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I beg the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion, until I can ask an order of the House for the printing of some papers.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have no desire to press the motion against the wishes of the House. My purpose is to facilitate the public business. As other committees desire to make reports, I withdraw my motion.

CONTESSED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I desire to present, from the Committee of Elections, certain papers referring to the contested-election cases from Ohio and Nebraska, and to move that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The call of committees was then resumed.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGER BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back House bill (No. 45) further to amend an act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes, and moved that said bill be printed, and its further consideration postponed until the first Tuesday in February.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF THE LAND OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. COBB. I desire to offer a resolution; and, in doing so, I will say that I do it at the request of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Of course it will go to the Committee on Printing. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the report of the Commissioner on Public Lands be printed for the use of the Land Office.

I will suggest that I suppose this resolution must, as a matter of necessity, go to the Committee on Printing. If it is competent for the House to pass the resolution by unanimous consent at this time, it would save cost to pass it, as the types are all set up.

I ask the Chair if it is indispensable that such reports shall go to the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the law and rule of the House both require that such resolutions shall go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe we have printed, or ordered to be printed, twenty thousand extra copies of the President's message with the accompanying documents. This report is included as one of the accompanying documents, and I think that perhaps that is enough. I suppose that, in addition to these, the Land Office have had the report printed for their own use.

Mr. COBB. They have not; and now want it printed for the use of the several land offices throughout the country.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think it is the usual practice for the several Departments to have their reports printed for their own use.

Mr. COBB. This report has not been printed by the Land Office, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office asks that it may be printed.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. This is a resolution to print extra copies, and must go to the Committee on Printing, without debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the same opinion. The resolution goes, as a matter of course, to the Committee on Printing, without debate.

Mr. LETCHER. If it is out of order to debate this resolution now, when will it be in order to debate it?

The SPEAKER. When the Committee on Printing reports back the resolution, as a matter of course, it will be open for discussion. The law requires that the subject go at once to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. LETCHER. When the Committee on Printing report back the resolution it will be put through under the previous question, and there will be no opportunity of debating it.

The SPEAKER. That will depend on the action of the House, and not on the rule.

Mr. LETCHER. There is yet $1,000,000 due on the printing ordered by the last two Congresses. I think we had better pay that off, and stop.

LIABILITY OF SHIP-OWNERS.

Mr. WADE. I desire to report, from the Committee on Commerce, a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to limit the liabilities of ship-owners, and for other purposes," approved 3d March, 1851.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Committee on Commerce has been passed in the call of committees, and the report of the gentleman is therefore not in order.

Mr. WADE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report the bill and put it upon its passage.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am reluctant to object to anything out of order. I am willing that the bill should be reported and referred, but if it is to be put on its passage and to take up the morning hour, I prefer that the call of committees should proceed regularly, and I object.

Mr. WADE. If objection is made to putting the bill on its passage, I will not report it at present.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

PRINTING OF PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. WHITELEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to submit a resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let the resolution be read, and then I will raise a question of order upon it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House one hundred thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents on agriculture, for the year ending 1856, together with the plates, of which number, six thousand copies shall be for the use of the Patent Office.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The question of order which I raise is, that the report which it is proposed by that resolution to print, is not in the possession of the House, and that the House has no control over it. This report was made to the last Congress, and two hundred thousand extra copies ordered to be printed, eight hundred copies of which went to each congressional district. It is to be presumed that each member discharged his duty, and sent his copies to his constituents, so far as they have been furnished. I believe those which were assigned to me for my constituents have not been delivered or sent by me. I believe they are now in the folding room, and I intend, as soon as I can, to send them out.

But, sir, as my friend from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] has just informed me and the House, there are now something like a million dollars due for printing ordered by the last Congress and the preceding one. And, sir, as this report is not in the possession of the House, we have nothing to do with it. It is only the documents of the present Congress that we can order to be printed by resolution in this way.

Mr. WHITELEY. Is the point of order debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. WHITELEY. This resolution has been submitted by the Committee on Agriculture for the reason that every member of the Committee on Agriculture, and I suppose every member of the House, receives every day letter upon letter asking for these reports. Now, sir, I have nothing to do with the members of the last Congress, or with the books voted to them. I make no charges. But, sir, there are serious charges made in reference to the sale of books by members of Congress, and their not distributing them in their districts. I have nothing to do with that. But this fact I do know; that the farmers of this land are sending to us letters, I may say by the bushel, for these reports. And if it is not exactly in the charge of this Congress, I think the money will not be misspent by distributing throughout the land the information upon this subject of agriculture contained in this report.

Now, sir, if we do owe a million dollars for public printing, I must submit that I do not think another million for distributing information such as is contained in that report would be misspent. And why is it not in order for this Congress to publish a work which has been stereotyped, or of which the type is all set—a work printed by the order of the last Congress, and which is in such demand by the people of the country? It is for this House to determine, or rather for the Committee on Printing, in the first place, to determine; but I submit it to the Chair that, until the report from the Committee on Printing comes in, the gentleman's point of order is not well taken.

One other suggestion. I have a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, stating that letters upon letters have been received at the Patent Office, day after day, for these documents; and that, by the act of last Congress, the Commissioner is three thousand short of the number usually printed. I send the letter to the Clerk to be read.

The letter was as follows:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE,
December 21, 1857.

Sir: Understanding that it is contemplated by the Committee on Agriculture to offer a resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of the agricultural report of this office for the year 1853, I beg leave to suggest, in that event, for the consideration of the House, the propriety of placing a few thousand copies at the disposal of the Patent Office.

The number of copies heretofore assigned it by the Senate has been five thousand, but from some cause this number, at the last session, was reduced to two thousand, which reduction will prevent the office from meeting the demands of those who have legitimate claims upon it.

The work is eagerly sought for from all parts of the country, and I am well persuaded that the public interests would be subserved by its further distribution.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. HOLT, Commissioner.

Hon. W. G. WHITELEY, Chairman of Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. GROW. I was willing to allow the gentleman to reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, but I object to the time being occupied by the reading of letters.

Mr. LETCHER. Has the Chair decided the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided the point of order, but is about doing so. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. LETCHER. Then, sir, I raise another point. Has that subject ever been referred to the Committee on Agriculture to enable them to make a report to this House?

Mr. WHITELEY. Can I not offer a resolution to have the matter referred?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not in possession of the information asked for by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LETCHER. I raise the point of order that, until the information is before the House, that the subject has been referred to the Committee on Agriculture for their action, that committee cannot report this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware can state whether the Committee on Agriculture, of which he is chairman, has had the subject referred to them.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Delaware remarked that the type was set up, and that this document could be printed easily and economically. We must recollect that the Printer for this Congress is a new one; and that, if we order this printing, Mr. Steadman will have to execute it, and we must pay the expense of composition, and the higher price for press-work upon the first twenty thousand copies. It is the same as though a new document were ordered. We cannot order the printer of the last House, who has these stereotyped plates, or these forms made up, to do this work.

Mr. WHITELEY. I do not see why gentlemen should hold on to the spigot and let it out at the bung-hole. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia is well taken, that a committee cannot report back to the House upon a subject that has not been referred to it.

JOHN HAMILTON.

Mr. STANTON. When committees were last called for reports, I reported a bill for the relief of John Hamilton, of Champaign county, Ohio, without an accompanying report. I ask leave at this time to submit a report, and to move that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

The report was received, and the motion was agreed to.

OMISSION IN AN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back a bill to supply an omission in the enrollment of a certain act therein named; and move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The bill was received, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire what has been done with the resolution in reference to the printing of extra numbers of the Patent Office reports?

The SPEAKER. It was ruled out of order.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I hope there will be no objection to a reference of the subject to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GROW. I call for the regular order of business.

COURT OF CLAIMS BILLS.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move to reconsider the vote by which, on yesterday, certain bills from the Court of Claims were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. That reference is calculated to defeat that class of bills, for the reason that the Committee on Revolutionary Claims cannot report them back again to the House. If a modification be made of the 154th rule, like that which I send up to the Clerk to be read, it will obviate any necessity for a motion to reconsider. If that modification be agreed to, I shall withdraw my motion to reconsider.

The Clerk read the modification, as follows:

When bills and their accompanying reports from the Court of Claims have been or shall be referred to any other committee than the Committee of Claims, it shall be in order for such committee to report thereon at any time when it may be in order for the Committee of Claims to report similar bills; and the bills shall be printed and placed on the Calendar in the same manner as if reported by the Committee of Claims.

The 154th rule was read, as follows:

"The bills and their accompanying reports from the Court of Claims shall be referred by the Clerk of the House to the Committee of Claims; and it shall be in order every Friday morning, immediately after reading the Journal, for the Committee of Claims to report with reference to business from the Court of Claims; the bills reported to be printed and placed on the Private Calendar."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if my recollection serves me, the practice was, during the last session, on Fridays and Saturdays, which are by express rule set apart in each week for the consideration of bills of a private nature, to call upon committees for reports of such bills. This practice I presume will be continued during the present session; and if it is, it will of course supersede the necessity for any change of the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The House will have to authorize this to be done.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The practice of the House the last Congress was as I have stated it, if my recollection serves me right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is his intention to follow the practice of the last session, which will relieve the House of this difficulty.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. This modification which I propose will do no harm.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is no necessity for it, and it will complicate the rules.

The modification was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I insist, then, on my motion to reconsider, and ask that it be entered for future action.

The motion was entered.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report some resolutions simply calling for information.

The resolutions were read, and are as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, all correspondence between the Department of State and the Government of Paraguay, in any manner relating to our differences with that Government.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, such correspondence as has passed between the Department of State and our Minister near the Government of Brazil, in relation to the opening of the Amazon river, and the contraction of a reciprocity or other treaty.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, all correspondence which has passed upon the subject of our relations with Spain, not heretofore made public.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I would suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina the propriety of including New Granada in his resolution—that he insert "and of New Granada" after the word "Paraguay."

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no objection to that, if the gentleman will move the amendment. Of course I cannot alter the report.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolutions, as amended, were agreed to.

RICHARD H. WIGHTMAN.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER, from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill for the relief of Richard H. Wightman; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS SMITHERS.

Mr. CHAFFEE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Smithers; which was read a first and second time, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE, ETC.

Mr. MAYNARD. The special committee appointed on the 18th of last month, to investigate the conduct and accounts of the late Clerk, &c., and which, by reason of having no room assigned them in the Capitol for the dispatch of business, have not been able to attend to that business, have instructed me to present the following report:

The committee appointed to investigate the conduct and accounts of the late Clerk, &c., beg leave to report, that in order to expedite their labors, a stenographer, to act as clerk, will be necessary: wherefore, they submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the special select committee, appointed by resolution of the House of the 18th ultimo, to investigate the conduct and accounts of the late Clerk, &c., and they are hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer, to act as clerk for such length of time as they may deem necessary; and to receive the usual compensation for his services.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 93, noes 45.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] to the third of the resolutions submitted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. With the permission of the gentleman who is entitled to the floor, I desire to withdraw the amendment which I offered yesterday, and in lieu thereof to move that the subject of the neutrality laws be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to modify his amendment, but he had better reduce it to writing, as modified.

Mr. SICKLES. Mr. Chairman, it was not my desire to take any part in this discussion in its present stage, nor should I have allowed myself to be diverted from that purpose, but for the extraordinary turn which the debate took yesterday. Propositions were advanced from distinguished sources, censures were imposed, the Administration condemned, the conduct of eminent officers of the public service denounced—without facts, without a record before us, upon a very imperfect knowledge of the state of the case, and in advance of that requisition which we had made upon the Executive for such information as would enable the House to come to a just conclusion upon a grave public question.

Nor shall I permit myself now, in advance of the information which we all need, and which cannot be long delayed, to imitate the gentlemen who have preceded me in going into a full discussion of the question before the committee upon all its merits. I shall content myself at this time by putting on record my dissent from some of the propositions which have been advanced, to which I cannot accord an approval, and with which I do not believe the House will ever concur.

Why, sir, if we had been listening to a discussion in a House of Representatives convened by Mr. President Walker, in Nicaragua, we could not have heard doctrines more peculiarly in unison with his theories of government, as illustrated there, or more directly in conflict with the policy and history of our Government, than we were forced to listen to on yesterday in this Hall. We were told that the neutrality act of 1818 was unconstitutional, was inconsistent with the theory of our Government, and at war with the principles of our people. As I had read the history of my country, I had taught myself to believe that the policy embodied in the neutrality act of 1818 was the policy handed down to us from General Washington, and perpetuated in our statutes from the Administration of Washington down to the present day—the cherished policy of the American people, never dissented from by any Administration or by any party. Have we forgotten that, within a very recent period, we have had all the principles embraced in the neutrality act presented to the House and to the country in the enlistment question in which we were involved with the Government of Great Britain? Have we forgotten that Mr. Crampton, her Envoy, was dismissed because he had committed an act in violation of the provisions of the law of 1818? I had supposed that the whole country sustained the wisdom and firmness of the Executive in that enforcement of the traditional policy of the United States not to permit either its own citizens or the citizens or the representatives of any Power, great or small, to compromise the neutrality of the United States with reference to any nation or any people with whom we were at peace.

Nor must we forget that we have made treaties with various Powers, in which we have entered into stipulations based upon this very statute, and on the policy of which it is the exponent. The most recent of these—and I will not detain the committee by reference to others—are the treaty with New Granada, and, as rumor has it—we have no official information on the subject as yet—the treaty with Nicaragua. In the treaty with New Granada we have guaranteed to that Republic the neutrality of the route across the Isthmus of Panama. We have entered into stipulations to guaranty and maintain and protect that neutrality, more especially against any hostile acts perpetrated by our own citizens, or those claiming to be such.

Nor was I less surprised to hear the doctrine promulgated, that the executive authority of the United States was not authorized to send out the naval forces upon the high seas, to capture our citizens who had violated our laws. It was maintained that this authority could not be extended beyond a marine league.

Have gentlemen forgotten the treaty for the suppression of the slave trade on the coast of Africa in which the principle is distinctly recognized? In that treaty we agree to send a squadron of not less than eighty guns upon the coast of Africa for the purpose of exercising a police over those waters; and a police, not limited to those waters, but extending over all seas, for the purpose of suppressing that infamous traffic. I will read the article from the treaty:

"The parties mutually stipulate that each shall prepare, equip, and maintain in service, on the coast of Africa, a sufficient and adequate squadron, or naval force of vessels, of suitable numbers and descriptions, to carry in all not less than eighty guns, to enforce, separately and respectively, the laws, rights, and obligations of each of the two countries, for the suppression of the slave trade, the said squadrons to be independent of each other, but the two Governments stipulating, nevertheless, to give such orders to the officers commanding their respective forces as shall enable them most effectually to act in concert and cooperation, upon mutual consultation, as exigencies may arise, for the attainment of the true object of this article; copies of all such orders to be communicated by each Government to the other, respectively."—Treaty with Great Britain, 1842, article 8.

This power has been asserted by all parties and all Administrations. We have never before heard it seriously questioned that the Government of the United States had that power and that right; and such is the general principle of public law. The authorities are all cited by Wheaton, by whom the doctrine is thus stated:

"Both the public and private vessels of every nation, on the high seas, and out of the territorial limits of any other State, are subject to the jurisdiction of the State to which they belong."—Wheaton's International Law, part 2, chap. 2, sec. 10.

"This jurisdiction is exclusive only so far as respects offenses against the municipal laws of the State to which the vessel belongs."—Ibid., part 4, chap. 3, sec. 18.

But it seems that distinction is to be drawn with reference to the particular expedition of Walker, because it is claimed that his was a peaceful expedition when it set out from our shores; that it embarked in vessels that were not armed; that the men were not organized into platoons and companies and regiments; that arms had not been furnished to them; and that therefore neither the judicial nor the executive power of the Government could be invoked to arrest the expedition, or punish those who were engaged in it.

I need not remind the House that in every such expedition the question of intent is the one to be considered. With what intent was the expedition of Walker organized? With what intent did it set out from our shores? With what intent did it land upon the shores of Nicaragua? Sir, it would be an offense against the good sense of the House, to add anything to an argument already so plain, to prove that that expedition set out from our shores with the intent to make war; with the intent to take property and life within the State of Nicaragua, with which we had just made a treaty of amity and friendship. It is a notorious fact, that instantaneously upon the landing of the expedition in Nicaragua, acts of hostility were perpetrated, men were shot down, and property was seized.

But, sir, I have no desire to characterize offensively the conduct of Mr. Walker or his men. I shall merely apply to them the characterization which all writers on public law, and the duties of nations, apply to such acts. Every one of these writers calls such conduct robbery and murder:

"For the citizens of the United States, then, to commit murders and depredations on the members of other nations, or to combine to do it, appeared to the American Government as much against the laws of the land, as to murder or rob, or to combine to murder or rob, their own citizens; and as much to require punishment, if done within their limits, where they had a territorial jurisdiction; or on the high seas, where they had a personal jurisdiction; that is to say, one which reached their own citizens only; this being an appropriate part of each nation, on an element where each has a common jurisdiction."

NOTE.—Mr. Jefferson's letter to Mr. Genet, June 17th, 1793.—American State Papers, volume 1, page 155. Elements of International Law, by Wheaton, third edition.

The expedition set out, it is true—or, at least, I will assume it to be true for the sake of the argument—without the men having arms on their persons. I will assume it to be true that the vessels in which they sailed were unarmed. But, sir, our own judicial records show, that although an expedition may be thus artfully organized, and though attempts may be thus made to evade the neutrality laws and to compromise the good faith of our Government, yet such evasions and such contrivances are not suffered to screen the persons who resort to them from the consequences of their acts. This ground is distinctly taken in a case adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States. I refer to the case of the United States vs. Quincy, reported in 6 Peters. In that case the defense relied upon the grounds that there were no arms upon the men, and that there were no arms on board the ship. But the Supreme Court held, in that case, that it was a question of intent; that if the whole conduct of the expedition—what it did after it set out as well as what it did before—showed that their intention was to levy war against a people or nation with whom we were at peace, the offense came within the meaning of the act of 1818, and the parties were rendered amenable to its penalties.

No one would go further than myself in maintaining the right of every American citizen to seek for himself a home wherever he may choose. If he desire to pursue his calling, whatever it may be, in another land, let him go. If he desires, either alone, or in company with his fellows, to form an association of colonists, and emigrate peacefully to Central America, or elsewhere, let him or them go. And, so far from punishing such acts as crimes, I would encourage them, because I think the time has arrived when it ought to be the duty and pride of our citizens to disseminate our institutions, and to illustrate practically upon other shores, and among other people, the principles of freedom, of justice, and of liberality which they have learned under our system of government. I would like to see this done in Central America. I would like to see that isthmus Americanized in that sense, because I am not insensible to the fact that it is to be the great highway of commerce. Over that isthmus a very large portion of the commerce of the world is to pass, and it is for the interest of our people, political and commercial, that it should be Americanized as far and as rapidly as possible.

But expeditions like that recently organized, and conduct like that which has been recently seen there, are not calculated to promote the interests of the people of the United States, so far as they are connected with the isthmus of Central America. Sir, there are Republics there. They are our own sister Republics, with which it should be our pride, as it is our duty, to cultivate friendly and affectionate relations. Some of them have already made treaties with us. Others will do so ere long, provided we pursue towards them a policy fraternal, sympathetic, frank, and just. But let our Government deal with these Republics. Let our Government, animated as it is by a full consciousness of the high interests we have at stake there, and governed by principles of justice, good faith, and integrity, take charge of our interests in Central America and our intercourse with those Republics. Do not let us yield our assent that they be committed to the charge of those incapable of carrying them out, if they had the wish to do so; and who, so far as we have yet seen any proof, are rather bent on the purpose of individual aggrandizement, the pursuit of notoriety, or the acquisition of mere private gain, than animated by any wish to carry out the policy of the United States Government with reference to that isthmus.

It is said, Mr. Chairman, that this expedition was a peaceful one, that its men were artisans and agriculturists, who went there solely as propagandists of American ideas, but to propagandize by the force of their example alone, and not by hostile acts. I have only to say that, if this were the intent with which that expedition set sail, their plow-shares and their pruning-hooks were converted into swords with a suddenness which really throws some suspicion over the sincerity of their professions.

With reference to the conduct of Commodore Paulding, I have always supposed that the presumption, in the absence of facts, or in a very imperfect knowledge of the state of facts, was always in favor of the conduct of officers acting in the discharge of their duty at a remote post. I have also supposed that presumptions, at least, ought to favor our own country. The belief that what it did was right, has always been cherished by our people. If condemnation is to be visited, it is to be done reluctantly, discriminatingly, and only when the whole record forces it upon us as an imperative necessity.

But Commodore Paulding, it seems, is to be made an exception. Every presumption, in his case, is to be against him. Every accusation made by Walker and his followers is to be taken for truth, and nothing is to be assumed in favor of the gallant officer who has always heretofore discharged fully and faithfully every duty confided to him. While Nicaragua is not here to raise a solitary objection against the commander of our gulf squadron; while we are bound to assume, in the absence of any objection, that she welcomed him as a protector against the hostile acts of his own countrymen about to be perpetrated, and being perpetrated, with ruthless violence upon her people; while Nicaragua is silent against the act of our own officer, he is arraigned here in this House, though absent, unheard, and without the facts, without the information which we called for only a few days ago. Here, in the House of his friends, in the House of his own countrymen, he is called a kidnapper, and he is arraigned and denounced as guilty of outrages such as would beset him for any other station than that which he holds.

With reference to the particular act of Commodore Paulding, in going upon the territory of another State and exercising acts of authority there, I have no idea, nor does Commodore Paulding, in the letter which has been published, say that he was authorized to do so by his instructions. Nor would I dream for a moment that such a step should be regarded as a precedent to be followed by officers in command, either upon the land or upon the high seas.

There can be no question that in a technical point of view his act was illegal. There can be no doubt that he exceeded his instructions. It cannot be justified as a proper exercise of authority. But, sir, there is a wide difference between justifying as legal, and as within the line of official duty, an act like that of Commodore Paulding—there is a wide difference between such justification, and the denunciation which has been heaped upon him, and the disgrace which is invoked upon his head. He acted, undoubtedly, in accordance with what he conscientiously believed to be the spirit of his instructions. He had reason to believe that the United States Government regarded that expedition as unlawful; he had reason to believe that the persons composing it had escaped the executive and judicial authorities at home, and were compromising the neutrality of the United States, and that he would conform to the policy and the wishes and the expectation of his people at home if he prevented what was nothing else than a scheme of aggression and outrage against a nation with which we were at peace, and with which we had just made a treaty of amity and friendship.

Sir, this is not the first instance in which a commander of our forces has exceeded his instructions in accomplishing an object which he knew to be dear to the policy of his Government at home. We can never forget the time when General Jackson passed over into the territory of Spain and seized upon her forts and arrested her citizens, and hung some of them upon the first tree he met with. How was his conduct regarded by the Government of Mr. Monroe? How was it afterwards regarded by the American people? Was he recalled in disgrace? Was he arraigned by those who should not have arraigned him upon the floor of the House of Representatives? No, sir. President Monroe, in communicating that transaction to Congress, in his annual message, drew a careful line of distinction between an act of aggression against the Government and territory of Spain and the act of General Jackson in preventing her citizens and her forces, which were adjacent to our own territory, being employed in acts of hostility against our own people. Every presumption was made in favor of General Jackson, and rightfully made. And that, sir, was a transaction involving principles and involving conduct of an infinitely graver character than anything that we have yet heard imputed to Commodore Paulding.

I will read a brief extract from that portion of President Monroe's message relating to Major General Jackson's movements in Florida during the first Seminole war, and while Florida belonged to Spain:

"In entering Florida to suppress this combination, no idea was entertained of hostility to Spain, and however justifiable the commanding general was, in consequence of the misconduct of the Spanish officers, in entering St. Marks and Pensacola, to determine it by proving to the savages and their associates that they could not be protected even there, yet the amicable relations existing between the United States and Spain could not be altered by that act alone. By ordering the restitution of the posts these relations were preserved."—Monroe's second annual message—President's Messages: inaugural, annual, and special, from 1789 to 1846, compiled by Edwin Williams.

While so much has been said in condemnation of Commodore Paulding by those who, I think, ought at least to have waited the exhibition of the whole case before they launched their censure, nothing seems to be said in reference to the conduct and position of Walker himself. It cannot be forgotten that only a few months ago the naval forces of the United States rescued this man Walker from certain death; rescued him from his enemies, by whom he was beleaguered, by whom he had been reduced almost to starvation; rescued by like usurpation of authority, if you please. Inspired by motives of humanity, of generosity, of patriotism, and sympathy with a fellow-countryman, Captain Davis exerted his authority, interposed his good offices, assumed the responsibility of negotiating with the forces which had invested and subdued Walker, and saved him from a doom to which we would all look with horror, and brought him home and restored him to his friends.

Soon after that event, Walker addressed a letter, which was published all over the land, to the President, or to General Cass, the Secretary of State, (I do not remember precisely which,) in which he pledged his honor that he was not engaged, nor would he become engaged, in getting up any expedition against Nicaragua, or in doing any act inconsistent with the laws of the United States, and especially the neutrality act of 1818. He went through the country, to be sure, invoking sympathy as far as it was possible for him to obtain it for himself. But, sir, he left upon that shore of Nicaragua a devoted battalion of deluded followers, for whom no appeal was ever heard from him; and while organizing anew, against his own pledged honor, against the policy of his Government, and against the sound judgment of the American people, another corps of equally misguided partisans to go through the same scenes in Nicaragua, that gallant band which he left there, when so rescued by the humanity of our own Navy, was left to die and rot upon the very shores from which he had been rescued.

Now, sir, I think the country is entirely satis-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 8, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 14.

fied, both from the past career of the President of the United States in the councils of the country, as well as from the development of his policy in his annual message, that, with regard to Central America, he is fully alive to all the interests of our people, so far as they are involved or connected with those Republics, and with the isthmus, as the great highway of a large portion of the commerce of the world. The Executive has shown every disposition, by the formation of treaties, by the cultivation of kind and fraternal relations with those people, and those Governments, to aid in Americanizing, as far as it is possible to do so, that isthmus, so as to secure to our commerce and to our people all the various advantages which peace and neutrality and friendship on the part of the Republics of Central America can secure to us. While this is the case, is it anything other than madness, is it anything other than treason to the best interests of the country, for men to organize lawless expeditions for the purpose of going to those territories and making war there upon their own account, embroiling our country in new controversies, setting pernicious precedents to other nations, our rivals with reference to Central America, and to the commerce which is to pass over it?

Sir, our Government has made a pledge before the whole world that it disavows these expeditions; that it regards them as against our own laws, and as against the laws of nations, and it has pledged its faith that it will exert its whole power to arrest them, to put them down, to prevent their consummation. Shall the faith of our Government be maintained? Or shall it be said by other nations, as it has been said, that we are not sincere in this pledge; that we are false in these professions; that these expeditions are connived at; that they are condemned on paper, but that they are encouraged in fact? Sir, let us not court any such dishonor for our Government and our people by censuring the officers of our Navy who act in good faith in carrying out what they believe and know, and what they have reason to know, to be the earnest wish of the Government.

Sir, the Executive is charged with the conduct of our foreign relations. In accordance with the theory of our Government, while the whole responsibility of initiating and conducting to successful issues our intercourse and relations with foreign countries is imposed upon the Executive, it is necessary, it is demanded by constitutional obligations and by comity between one branch of the Government and another, that the Executive responsibility should not be impaired on the one hand, and its power not be destroyed upon the other, by an improper, an unjust, an ungenerous interference with its duty—and with its fair and faithful discharge of that duty—by Congress. We rightfully hold the Executive responsible to see to it that the interests of our people, of our commerce, of our trade, are protected in Central America. We hold it responsible for the making of treaties with the Republics there, by which the various routes on the isthmus shall be maintained and kept open to our commerce and trade. We hold it responsible to see that peace is preserved there, at least so far as any act of foreign aggression may disturb the peace of the isthmus. We hold it responsible for seeing to it that no foreign nation shall interfere, either by filibustering on private account or aggressions on Government account, with the rights of our citizens in Central America. And, sir, while we hold the Executive justly to this large and high responsibility, at least, let us always accord to it our confidence in its wisdom, sincerity, and patriotism; and, also, to the officers of our Navy, who are invested with great official responsibilities upon a distant service, a like correctness of motive and a like loyalty, until the proofs displayed before us inexorably force us to a different conclusion.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident, and necessarily so, that the committee are not now prepared to go on with the discussion of this question. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the question that has occupied the attention of gentlemen here, yesterday and to-day; and if the committee desire to vote upon the pending amendment, and then pass from this resolution to the consideration of the other resolutions relating to the President's message, I will yield the floor for that purpose.

It is intimated to me, sir, that other gentlemen desire to speak upon this question, and knowing the difficulty, under our rules, of getting the floor whenever the most proper time comes, I shall proceed to the consideration of the subject that I design to discuss. My object, Mr. Chairman, is to call the attention of the committee and the country to another question, one that deeply agitates the country—not the froth and outlaws of the cities—but the great hearts of those who love justice and are interested in the preservation of free institutions.

Since the last Congress, the country has been startled by a political opinion of our Supreme Court, known as the Dred Scott decision, that makes it doubtful whether we have not already relapsed into despotism. The President indorses it, and I am informed that the Departments base their official action upon it, and it is for this I now and here arraign it. The irregularity of that opinion; the absurdity of turning a man out of court for want of jurisdiction, and then giving judgment against him on the merits; the anomalous character of its reasoning; its disregard of the rights of the States, the rights of man, and the truth of history; its reckless partisanship and eager malice, form the saddest chapter in modern jurisprudence. I ordinarily feel bound to treat judicial opinions with respect, though they disagree with mine. But, while I remember that the meanest tyrants the world has known have been the sworn expounders of the law, I can have no reverence for men merely as judges; and if they descend from their high calling as protectors of liberty and law, to become their betrayers, their position shall not screen their double treachery from just scrutiny.

This court is itself a democratic anomaly—a solecism, as Jefferson called it. Its conduct has vindicated the democratic principle, so strangely departed from in its organization, and I hope for the coöperation of the Democracy here in support of the bill which I hope to introduce for the curtailment of its overgrown powers. Without a show of reason, in face of all law, all authority, a sectional, irresponsible body, a body blind with prejudice, if no worse, representing nothing but a despotic interest, and gathered together, by long and careful labor and sifting, for the express purpose of serving that interest; trusting to their irresponsibility, and callous to the opinion of mankind, this body, to the extent of its power, has overthrown the law of citizenship, and published pages of gross and illegal dicta upon the law of slavery. This decision and this dicta have been triumphantly answered by the minority of the court, and by distinguished citizens of the States; yet, I feel impelled, as the Representative of a people burning with a sense of outraged justice, to enter their and my indignant protest.

With the reproduction of the novelties of the propagandists, to digest which, for the future shibboleth of the slave Democracy was this dicta uttered, I shall not now muddle. I have before considered these novelties; I may do so again; but my object now is to examine as fully as your oppressive rules will permit, what I understand to be the decision of the court. I feel especially impelled to this course now, because some gentlemen seem fearful of being suspected of concern for the rights of blacks, and the attention of others seem diverted from this insidious and most dangerous attack, by the enemy's fresh attempts to enslave our own territories, and rob, to enslave, those of our neighbors.

And in view of some disclaimers, here and elsewhere, upon one matter I wish to be distinctly understood. Whatever my philosophy in regard to races, it has no business here. However I may deprecate the unwise efforts of some friends of freedom, I reserve my censures for them and in their own presence. But here, under the shadow of a despotic interest, a corporation compared to which a union of all the banks in America under a single directory, condensed from a thousand Biddles, would be but a gentle monster, where it so often frightens cowards and scourges slaves, I scorn to say or do aught that may imply a doubt of my living sympathy with the crushed subjects of its power, or with any who manfully withstand it. And I pray not to be suspected of that spurious philanthropy, atheistic Christianity, or false Democracy, that is indifferent to the wrongs of any class. As a Christian, I believe that God is our common Father; that "he has made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth;" that Christ is the elder brother as well of the Ethiopian and Saxon, as his own race, and that as we treat the least of these his brethren, we treat him. As a Democrat, I believe in the equality of all men before the law, and that human rights pertain to human nature. As a legislator, a dispenser of justice, so far from discriminating against the helpless and weak, if I found one man, or class of men, more helpless or more subject to popular prejudice, for his or their benefit alone would I favor class legislation or judicial leaning. The strong can protect themselves; the weak need the prop, and the defenseless the shield. And when men tell me here, or through their co-workers in yonder vault, of the dependence of the Afro-American, or of the rapidly increasing class of Africo-European blood, I would not, hence, forbid him letters, forbid him property, forbid him all opportunity and manly motive, but would more sedulously guard his rights, more patiently develop his manhood. Let the tyrant slander his victim and excuse his tyranny by its own effects, but let no Christian or Democrat thus defile the inner sanctum of his faith.

This court has undertaken to outlaw a large class of free American citizens. By its wicked edict they are, for the first time, turned out of the Federal courts; banished the public domain by denying preëmptions; robbed of their property in inventions by refusing patents; cut off from foreign travel, except as permanent wanderers, without nationality; and deprived of every constitutional guarantee of personal rights. It has hardly been surpassed in atrocity since that celebrated revocation, consigning the Protestants of France to dungeons or exile, or those black enactments outlawing the Catholics of Ireland; and I thank God for putting it into the heads of the weak men who issued it, to attempt to justify their act, to lay bare their nakedness, that the shock given our moral sense by the edict itself may be avenged by our contempt for its patent malice and the weak and far-fetched reasons which sustain it.

We are told in substance, in this opinion, that the descendants of African slaves cannot be citizens of the United States; that though they may be citizens of each State, yet, by some unwritten understanding, they were intended to be excluded from the operation of the Constitution of the United States; were not in that instrument referred to as either people or citizens; and no State can make them general citizens.

Passing for a time the falseness of the assumed fact, I will first inquire into the nature of citizenship, and especially that of the United States, and the power of the States over it.

Confusion in the meaning of the term citizen is often created by referring to its use in the old Republics. The words translated citizen were originally used to designate the privileged inhabitants of the chief city and their immediate descendants. Aristotle, the apostle of conservative democracy, defines a citizen to be one born of citizen parents, who has a right to participate in the judicial and executive part of government. He condemns their engaging in servile employment; "For," says he, "it is impossible for one who lives the life of a mechanic or hired servant, to practice a life of virtue." (Aris. on Gov., b. 3.) The citizens of the Grecian Republics were but a minority of the people of even the ruling city, and though Rome greatly extended citizenship beyond the narrow bounds of Grecian policy, still, until long after the term ceased to have any practical significance, it was confined to a very limited class of the Roman people, scarcely extending beyond the walls of the city. True, within the city, in the days of her earlier glory, Rome was liberal, conferring citizenship upon the emancipated slave as well as his master, yet the civis of the Republic, as with the Greek, πολιτης, possessed rather the double signification of burgher in reference to the town, and elector in reference to the State, and is only rendered citizen from our want of a corresponding word.

But we use not the word in its legal sense, as one of aristocratic or municipal distinction, to designate the descendants of the original settlers of Boston, or Jamestown, or any other original city, nor such other inhabitants of the provinces as have acquired the "freedom of the city." It no longer means electors, or those enrolled in the national or city guards, but is a simple transfer of, or substitute for, the word subject. By the Declaration of Independence the subjects of King George became citizens of the several States; so by the inauguration of the French Republic les sujets of Louis became les citoyens of France. Though in common and loose language we all speak of electors merely as citizens, yet in the most liberal States all citizens—as women and children—are not electors, and sometimes aliens are made electors. The terms are not at all synonymous or convertible, though closely connected.

I speak not now of those native inhabitants subjected to servitude, and upon whose persons may be committed with impunity all the crimes of the decalogue. Upon them, whether of European, Indian, or African descent, society wages eternal war. They are constant prisoners, grinding in the prison-house of bondage, and it matters little, while thus subjected, whether we call them citizens or not.

But, with this exception, if it be an exception, citizenship is opposed simply to alienage. As in monarchies, all persons are either subjects or aliens, so in our Republic all are either citizens or aliens. This idea of citizenship is the only one tangible, the only one that will stand a moment the test of criticism; and I defy gentlemen to give me a definition of the term that shall not embrace all the native and naturalized members of the community. It was the only idea known in our better days. Section two of article three, and section eleven of the amendment to the Federal Constitution speak of citizen and subject as convertible terms. By the Articles of Confederation citizenship in the several States was expressly granted to the "free inhabitants" of each State, and it will hardly be pretended that the boon would be extended to the natives of other States beyond its enjoyment at home.

This idea is clearly stated by Chief Justice Gaston in 5 Iredell, page 253. He says:

"According to the laws of this State, all human beings within it who are not slaves fall within one of two classes. Whatever distinctions may have existed in the Roman laws between citizens and free inhabitants, they are unknown to our institutions. Before our Revolution, all free persons born within the dominion of the King of Great Britain, whatever their color or complexion, were native-born British subjects; those born out of his allegiance are aliens." * * * "Upon the Revolution no other change took place in the laws of North Carolina than was consequent on the transition from a colony dependent on a European king to a free and sovereign State." * * * "British subjects in North Carolina became North Carolina freemen. Foreigners, until made members of the State, remained aliens."

I might occupy my whole time in giving authorities and illustrations upon this point. Citizenship, as well as allegiance, is the incident of birth. The few exceptions, as to children of foreign ministers or temporary sojourners, but confirm the doctrine; and, indeed, until the interests of slavery demanded a different position, none other was thought of in modern law.

But except by some act of the sovereign power, none but the native born can be citizens. The immigrant from Connecticut would be an alien in Ohio, and the Massachusetts trader enjoy none of the rights of citizens in Georgia, for the citizens of Ohio and the citizens of Georgia would be those only born therein. How, then, do immigrants from one State, or from foreign countries become citizens? Whence obtain they these "privileges and immunities?" Must each State pass naturalization laws; or is this matter provided for? The Constitution provides for both cases clearly and distinctly. The exclusive power to make rules for the naturalization of aliens to all the States is granted to Congress, so that so far as the foreign born are concerned, it alone can determine the manner in which they shall become citizens of the States. But though Congress has no jurisdiction over the citizenship of natives, yet for them, too, the provision is equally specific. The citizens of each State are expressly made citizens of all the States, or, which is the same thing, are entitled to all the "privileges and immunities" of citizens within them. Thus the whole ground is covered, and no State naturalization becomes necessary. This would seem so plain that "the way-faring man * * * need not err therein;" yet this strange opinion, as if to keep up its departure from all show of reason and law, gravely pronounces that the clause to which I have referred does not "apply to a person who, being a citizen of a State, migrated to another State," (page 422,) that "the provision is confined to citizens of a State who are temporarily in another State, without taking up their residence therein." If this be its construction, I beg to know, and I am interested in knowing, how a native of Connecticut can become a citizen of Ohio. No other clause in the Constitution can have the effect to make him such, and if this does not, Ohio must act before he can be admitted to the privileges of Ohio citizenship. Supposing—vainly as it would seem—that the Federal Constitution had decided that point, Ohio has made no provision on the subject, so that were the Chief Justice himself to migrate to Ohio, and there commence suit in the Federal court against a citizen of Maryland, the fact that he was a native of Maryland, were his opinion law, would be a good plea to his allegation of Ohio citizenship. If not, I should like to have the error of the plea pointed out, and the process explained by which he became a citizen of Ohio.

But the phrase "citizen of the United States" is no less loosely used than the term itself. It is not only employed to mean a person entitled to all the privileges of citizens in the several States—sometimes called a general citizen—but also to designate one as primarily a citizen of the Union as a single consolidated Government. For the former case we have seen that the Constitution has made ample provision, by making every State citizen a general citizen. But, as we go beyond that, we tread uncertain ground; and I know of no surer indication of our departure from the true idea of this Federation, than the loose habit we all have of speaking of United States citizenship; and I claim no exemption from this indication of the seductive influence of the pervading consolidation tendencies. We sometimes speak of persons as citizens of the United States, residing in a State, or of a double citizenship, held by each, and in the case now under discussion, citizenship of the United States, instead of the State citizenship of the Constitution, is generally spoken of as giving jurisdiction to the Federal courts.

That there is such a thing as citizenship of the United States, in some sense, is clear. The Constitution uses the term, but its meaning must be controlled by the constitutional relation of the States. I can find nothing in the Constitution, or in that relation, that gives color to the idea that there can be any such thing as United States citizenship, in itself considered; that there can be a citizen of the United States who is not a citizen of a State, or a State citizen who is not also a citizen of the United States; or to the idea that the Federation can do anything whatever to constitute, direct, or control citizenship, except as to aliens.

Of course, I speak not now of resident natives of the District of Columbia, or the Territories. They are outside the States, not provided for in the Constitution, which was made for the States, and are citizens of the Union alone, because born within its general and exclusive jurisdiction.

Can it, then, be possible that this grand "national" Government of ours is destitute of so important a power—the power to say who shall be its own citizens, its own people? That this power is left to its constituent parts, so to speak? These are formidable questions to consolidationists, still more so to strangers to our system; but to American Democrats the answer is easy. That the Federal Constitution, so far as it is an instrument of government, is a grant by the people of the States of specific and clearly-defined powers, that there is no power where there is no grant, that none are given by implication except what are necessary to execute those expressly granted, and that all others are reserved to the States and the people thereof, are the axioms of their creed. We search in vain for any general Federal authority over citizenship, so that, even in the absence of the guarantee to the citizens of each State, we must inevitably find the power over this subject to be one of those reserved. The States, then, determine who are citizens, and we mean by a citizen of the United States, simply a citizen of one of the States; and when we describe a person as a citizen of the United States, residing in a State, we use a phrase liable to misconception; and when we speak of the double relation held by each citizen to his State and the United States, we use language politically loose, unless we mean that the latter relation is held solely through and by virtue of the first.

To the objection that the naturalization powers of Congress authorize a citizenship of the United States without reference to a State, I reply by denying the assumption. The people of the States, that the rule of naturalization might be uniform, authorized Congress to prescribe it, and nothing more. But aliens, naturalized under this rule, immediately became citizens of the State of their domicile; otherwise, how can they avail themselves of the guarantee of general citizenship?

The conclusion, then, is irresistible, this court to the contrary notwithstanding, that all "the citizens of each State" are not only "entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," but are, thereby, citizens of the United States.

The folly of the main assumption of the court, that there exists in the States a class of native inhabitants who are not and cannot become citizens, equally appears, whether we say that a State may make or unmake its citizens, or whether the condition of the native born is fixed. It is clear that if any power can say what natives are citizens, it is the State alone; if no power, then the question must be decided by the general law, the Articles of Confederation, and the Constitution. By the first are included all the native born; by the second the "free inhabitants" of the several States; and by the last, all the citizens of the several States, which last provision must refer back to the first and second. Those naturalized by the Articles of Confederation have all passed away, so that if the States have no control over citizenship, we are driven to the general law, to the inevitable result of nativity.

But the States do possess power over the subject. I will not say that they can unmake, so to speak, a citizen; can change the fact of nativity, or its just effect, for I am no believer in a State's omnipotence, nor will I advocate its power to do wrong; but to confer citizenship upon other than aliens, the States are clearly competent. They are competent, for they have never parted with the power, and all powers not delegated are reserved. They are competent, for from the beginning they have conferred it without dispute; and though bad precedents should be overruled, just ones are law. Slaves, though natives, have not been regarded as citizens; for, by a legal fiction, they are, while their status remains, alien enemies, and prisoners of war; and, by the African code introduced with the ancestors of these prisoners, they and the descendants of their women became slaves. This status and this fiction and this code yield to the breath of sovereignty; and these quasi alien prisoners become native-born free citizens.

The reasoning by which the court arrives at the impotency of the States in the premises is so brilliant, that I cannot refrain from giving it, as a specimen of the logic of this our infallible tribunal. The opinion says that, because the power to naturalize aliens is delegated to Congress, "it is very clear, therefore, that no State can, by any act or law of its own, * * * introduce a new member into the political community created by the Constitution." If the "new member" means alien, the conclusion is very clear indeed, as well as undisputed; but close on the heels of this truism follows a non sequitur that puts all dialectics to blush. "And for the same reason," that is, the reason that the power to naturalize aliens is delegated to Congress, "it," the State, "cannot introduce any person or description of persons who were not intended to be embraced in this new political family," &c. This person or description of persons, by a bold falsification of history, is assumed to be the descendants of African slaves. But admit the libelous assumption of this unwritten and fraudulent intention, how clear the logic! "For the same reason," indeed? Because a State has authorized the Federation to make rules by which aliens may acquire citizenship, for that reason it has parted with all power over the subject, not of alienage, but of citizenship. It has, therefore, no power to say whether its native-born inhabitants shall or shall not be general citizens; though, by this same instrument that grants this power over alienage, all powers not delegated are expressly reserved, and all its citizens are expressly made general citizens! I know not what deductions of reason may be clear to eyes filled with slave plantations; to eyes blinded by passion and interest; but if any school-boy, on any other theme, should so boggle in logic, he would be at once promoted from the forum to the dunce-block.

But suppose a State change this intention, if it ever existed: its general power over citizenship is clearly reserved, and under the liberalizing influence of Democracy and Christianity, it may abandon a design it was always ashamed to put on the record. What is to hinder? But it has no power, says the Chief Justice, and for the reason that it has delegated to Congress the power to make rules of naturalization. Well, then, we must look to Congress to naturalize these persons. But Congress can only provide for the naturalization of aliens; and these persons are native born. And thus we have a "description of persons" that can never be made citizens; and for the reason that Congress may naturalize another description of persons!

And is this the new phase of the doctrine of State rights? I have looked with anxious attention for the protests of those who annually indorse the resolutions of 1798 against this last and boldest in this court's long series of attacks upon the sovereignty of the States. The power of the States over citizenship, as clearly reserved, with the exception named, as any power can be; and the rights of those citizens to general citizenship, guaranteed as plainly as language can do it, are impudently denied, and by a reasoning that would disgrace a freshman. And yet these guardians of State sovereignty, men boisterous in defense of a State's right to oppress, clamorously echo the denial. The people of some of the States are believed—I wish there were no doubt of the fact—to be as earnestly devoted to justice, to the doctrines of the declaration and the spirit of the Constitution, as others are supposed to be to their opposite. To render fruitless that devotion, State sovereignty, and with it the Constitution, must be overthrown. Well may the colored American view with vengeful joy the madness of his insane tormentors, as he sees them in their eagerness to destroy every refuge from their hate, pull down upon their own heads the fair fabric of their own constitutional freedom!

But the doctrinal heresy of this opinion does not exceed its gross perversions of history. I do not propose now to wade through the mass of those perversions; to trace the garbled facts and false innuendoes; the appeals to low prejudice and despotic fears; the slanders of the great dead, and the miserable reasoning (?) that pervade it. With sorrowful emotions I have been through them all; and I have sometimes imagined the shades of Jay and of Marshall—men with whose national doctrines I have little sympathy, yet men who loved law and revered justice—to be sadly looking o'er with me the dirty page, wondering that they ever should have looked to irresponsible bodies as a check upon popular injustice.

The main historical claim I alone have time to notice. "When the Constitution was adopted," says the syllabus, "they (free negroes) were not regarded in any of the States as members of the community which constituted the State, and were not numbered among its 'people or citizens.'"

If this claim be true, it must be susceptible of the most unequivocal proof. Upon so important a question it will never do to admit a doubt; and the rule excluding these persons must have been clear and explicit; yet such explicit exclusion is not pretended; but the fact is sought to be established by a series of strained inferences and mere guesses. Resort is not had to the law and the testimony. Statutes, constitutions, records, are passed by as unworthy of attention; and the assumption of the exclusion is founded upon the fact alone that the ancestors of its subjects had been enslaved, and they themselves were sometimes unjustly treated—as though Governments had done anything else, in this world of ours, than oppress, directly or indirectly, one class or another of their citizens or subjects.

This, then, is the proposition: "that no person whose ancestors had been oppressed, and who was himself ill-treated by the colonists, could have been numbered among the people or citizens." I would advise caution to those who propose to accept this proposition, a close examination of the genealogical tree, lest the conclusion might apply where least expected.

But the great birth Act of the Republic is in the way of the court, and the audacious sacrilege with which that act is treated, I confess, surprises me. The great principles of justice and natural law upon which it was founded—those principles that alone redeemed our fathers from the charge of criminal rebellion—are limited to a race, to a mere fraction of the human family; and failing in argument to prove this limitation, the court majestically pronounces it "too clear for dispute." The idea, so sublime yet so simple, that the common Father of mankind has endowed His children with rights which cannot be taken from them—the right to life and the right to liberty—this divine idea, the harmonic chain of human society, before which our fathers bowed in humble contrition for their own inconsistency, yet in fervent hope for its full realization, because of this inconsistency is shorn of its holiness, is made but the precept of tyranny. That sentence that has commanded the homage of mankind, this court would thus sneeringly render: "we hold these truths to be self-evident, that the superior races, if born of free mothers, are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among them are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights Governments are instituted, deriving their just powers from the consent of such races, if free and white, among the governed."

But our fathers deserve not this taunt. That they were not wholly consistent, is too true—and what human institutions realize the ideal of those who are leading us onward and upward?—but none were more keenly sensible than they of this inconsistency; none could be more anxious to be redeemed from its charge; and not by apostasy to their sublime faith, but by "works meet for repentance." We accordingly find the great and good among them anxiously laboring to carry out the doctrines of the Declaration, and as understood by them, not by this court. Franklin, Jay, Hamilton, and others, became officers of societies for the abolition of slavery and protection of the free. And to illustrate our own apostasy from these truths, in contrast with their former appreciation, I ask attention to the fact that a recent officer of the same society of which Franklin was president, for pursuing its legitimate work—a work that wove the brightest flowers in the chapel on the brow of the philosopher—was illegally thrown into prison by a Federal judge, while his own State refused him protection, and his own city applauded the outrage. So Washington and Jefferson, and all others whose names posterity holds in reverence, united in condemning slavery, and especially as a glaring inconsistency with the principles of the Declaration.

But to be more specific: This court was forced to admit, and thereby admitted away its whole case, that all who were citizens in the several States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, became citizens of the United States. (Page 406.) So we have only to inquire whether free blacks were then citizens in any of the States.

I assert that the native born among them were then citizens in all the States, because—

1. They were citizens by the general law, by virtue of their nativity, unless excluded by express and unequivocal enactments; and I have been unable to find such exclusion in any of the States.

2. The Articles of Confederation had made them general citizens. "The free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States." It would seem that nothing could be more plain than this, and especially when an unsuccessful attempt was made to amend it by inserting "white" before "inhabitants," and especially, also, as the article itself contains exceptions not including negroes. And yet, with characteristic effrontery, this court asserts that "free inhabitants" cannot include free negroes, and for the reason—mark the logic—that the southern States, in order to throw the chief burden of the war upon the States best able to bear it, procured the adoption of the provision that the quota of land forces should be proportioned to the "white inhabitants" of the States. Because of this apportionment of troops, therefore—no, "therefore" is not sufficiently positive, and the sequitur requires a very strong connective; "it cannot for a moment be supposed," says the court, that "free inhabitants" can mean other than free white inhabitants! This sequitur reminds me of the boy's syllogism: "I gave my knife for a ride to Boston; my knife cost fifty cents; it is therefore fifty miles to Boston." If any one doubts the conclusion, it can be at once nailed by some authoritative pronunciamento that "none other can for a moment be supposed." What fools composed the delegations that sought to insert "white" as restrictive of general citizenship, and with others actually procured its insertion as restrictive of their obligation to raise troops! They should have known that it was always understood.

3. They were universally recognized as citizens. The elective franchise, till very recently granted to none but citizens, was conferred upon them in nearly all the original States; was within my own recollection enjoyed in North Carolina, Tennessee, and Pennsylvania, and still is in New York and nearly all the New England States. Their citizenship itself was scarcely, if at all, disputed. South Carolina and Delaware alone refused them the rights of electors, but I cannot learn that even there the general law upon the subject was doubted or sought to be changed.

The new-fangled idea of this court was clearly unknown in 1800. In that year Mr. Wain presented to the House an anti-slavery petition from the free men of color of Philadelphia. The petitioners expressly spoke of themselves as citizens of the United States; and although the petition caused two whole days of angry discussion, none disputed the fact of citizenship, or claimed for it any different treatment than though it came from whites.

I can only allude to the complaint of Mr. Jefferson against the attack of a British ship-of-war upon the Chesapeake, and killing and seizing "American citizens"—those citizens being negroes; to the proclamation of General Jackson at New Orleans, calling upon the free colored people, as citizens, to rally in defence of their country; the final resolution of Congress admitting Missouri into the Union, overruling one clause of her constitution against free men of color from other States, because it contravened that clause of the Constitution guaranteeing general citizenship; or to the former practice of granting foreign passports to free colored as well as white citizens; and cannot allude at all to the thousand other similar instances that challenge attention. They all render absurd the assumption that these persons "were not regarded in any of the States as members of the community," &c.

I have no time to go into further detail; but inasmuch as the Chief Justice has asserted that "it cannot be believed that the larger slaveholding States regarded them as included in the word citizens," I will briefly refer to the acts of Virginia on the subject, which I believe was a tolerably large slaveholding State.

The first action of Virginia upon citizenship I find in 10 Henning, p. 129-30, in the act of May 3, 1779, "declaring who shall be deemed citizens of this Commonwealth." By that act it was provided, "that all white persons," &c., and "the free white inhabitants of every one of the States," should be deemed citizens, and should enjoy all the rights, &c., of citizens of Virginia. This restriction to "white persons" within the State was so contrary to the general law, and to the spirit of the day, and the restriction to the "white inhabitants" of the other States was so contrary to the Articles of Confederation, that at the October session, 1783, (11 Henning, 323-4) the act was expressly repealed, and it was then enacted that "all free persons born within the territory of this Commonwealth * * * shall be deemed citizens of this Commonwealth."

This last act continued in force some forty years, till a race arose that "knew not Joseph"—till after the commencement of that grand defection which has culminated in the Dred Scott decision. "It cannot be believed," indeed! If this court would give more attention to facts, and less to despotic interest and instincts, it might be led to believe many things yet hidden from its sight.

There is another fact in the legislation of Virginia, that may throw a little light upon the inquiry, as to whom this large slaveholding State regarded as included in the word citizen. In 9 Henning, 267-8, I find "an act for regulating and disciplining the militia," passed May 5, 1777, and in force, so far as I find, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. It begins as follows:

"For forming the citizens of this Commonwealth into a militia, and disciplining the same for defense thereof, be it enacted by the General Assembly, that all free male persons, hired servants and apprentices, between the ages of fifteen and fifty years, (except the Governor, &c.) shall, by the commanding officer of the county in which they reside, be enrolled and formed into companies of not less than thirty-two, nor more than sixty-eight rank and file, and these companies shall again be formed into battalions," &c.

Here we have it on the record, plain and unequivocal, in the first year of our independence. "All free male persons" are expressly recognized as included in the words "citizen of this Commonwealth." "But this 'cannot be believed,'" our court would say. "The large slaveholding States" could not so regard them; and as we have decided that "free inhabitants" means free white inhabitants, so "free male persons" must mean free white male persons." But, as if anticipating modern judicial acumen, the same act goes on to say: "the free mulattoes in said companies or battalions, shall be employed as drummers, fifiers, or pioneers." So it must "be believed" that "free male persons" means free male persons.

Further, on page 280, I find it provided, that the recruiting officers shall not "enlist any negro or mulatto into the service of this or either of the United States, until such negro or mulatto shall produce a certificate from some justice of the peace of the county wherein he resides, that he is a free man."

And in view of the fact that all the States enlisted in the armies of the Revolution their free colored, as well as white citizens, and upon the same terms; that they flocked to their country's standard with the same alacrity as the whites; that they fought and bled on every battle-field—the first blood shed in the contest being that of a negro; that ever since, they have been pensioned under the same laws as white soldiers; how intensely mean the bald assumption that they were not a part of the people of the United States! Great are the necessities of despotism, and humiliating the shifts to which it drives its votaries!

If those who fought through the war to establish our liberties, who were electors in nearly every State, and voted for the delegates that adopted the Constitution, who were embraced under the general law of citizenship, and nowhere excluded—if they formed no part of the people or citizens of the country, I should like to know on what rest the claims of any man, when the necessities of despotism demand his exclusion?

I have, I believe, succeeded in showing that United States citizenship, in respect to natives, is a matter exclusively of State regulation; so that the citizens of each State are citizens of the United States; and I have also negated the assumption that colored natives were nowhere treated and considered as a part of the people, or citizens of the several States, at the adoption of the Federal Constitution. So that, with the undisputed and universal modern law, that makes all native members of the community citizens, which law is nowhere repealed, and is faithfully enforced in many of the States, it plainly appears that a native-born free descendant of African slaves may be a citizen of the United States.

I have thus sought to vindicate the law, the rights of the States, and the rights of an oppressed class. I know that some are disturbed by any allusion to the wrongs of mere blacks. They would get the negro out of politics, not by binding up his wounds, but by passing by on the other side. To such shallow politicians I have only to say that, if you have not the moral instincts that impel you to withstand injustice wherever exhibited, at least have the sagacity to look to your own future. Tyranny always creeps on apace. Its first precedents pander to the public appetites, or flatter the public prejudice. Power after power has been drawn to this tribunal; till, grown strong by acquiescence, and reckless by strength, at last the very political existence of individuals is assailed. Verdant, indeed, would it have been had its attack not chimed with the vulgar prejudice. But let this become an undisputed precedent, and upon whom will light the next proscriptive edict? and how long before political opinion, rather than complexion, will be cause of outlawry? When will men learn that though justice may for a time sleep, its exactions are inflexible and its penalties sure?

Mr. HASKIN. From the latitude taken in debate upon the resolution of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] from the discursive character of that debate, and especially from the remarks which fell from the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] attacking Commodore Paulding, who is my immediate constituent, I feel it to be my duty, as his congressional Representative on this floor, to say something, feeble though it may be, in vindication of his gallant conduct in arresting the expedition of Walker against Nicaragua.

I listened, Mr. Chairman, with attention and respect to the remarks submitted by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] a gentleman whom, as a New Yorker, as a distinguished civilian as well as general, I am proud that the State of New York gave to Mississippi. With many of the remarks which fell from the lips of that gentleman respecting the repeal of the neutrality laws, I concur. At the proper time, and under proper circumstances, I will perhaps be prepared to go as far as any member of the responsible majority of this House in favor of a suspension of the neutrality laws. But, sir, I will not do it for the reasons assigned by that gentleman.

He said, in the course of his remarks, that it was not the duty of this Government to interfere in a fight between individuals; and upon that he founded his argument in favor of a repeal of the neutrality laws. I concede his proposition; but when you apply his doctrine to an armed expedition, fitted out to invade a nation with which we are at peace, then I will not go with him for such a repeal of the neutrality laws. It was in a case of this kind, and to meet a case of this character, that these identical neutrality laws of 1818 were passed. From an examination of them, it appears to me that they were prepared with a view to this very case of Walker and his men; and it is a singular fact, it is a remarkable coincidence of time, that in this very year 1818, Arbuthnot and Ambrister were hung as high as Haman by General Jackson for doing against this Government that which, in my judgment, was not more reprehensible than what Walker has done towards a country with which we are at peace—towards a weak people, the Nicaraguans.

From an examination of the neutrality laws, I find that the jurisdiction of the United States is specially referred to. The jurisdiction is mentioned in terms—"within the United States," in each of the preceding sections until you come down to section eight. I am disposed to give to that section the interpretation given to it by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOGOCCK.] We find in that section that there is no language confining the jurisdiction within the limits of the United States; but the President, in the event of an armed invasion being contemplated, in the event of an armed expedition being fitted out, is authorized to call upon the Army and Navy to protect our treaty obligations, and to sustain the honor of our Government. In this section you find other remarkable words, which do not appear in any of the other sections of the law. In this case it gives authority to capture a vessel within the "jurisdiction and protection" of the United States.

Now, sir, I contend on this floor, that, under this law, and under the law of nations, Commodore Paulding had the right to go without the marine league; that he had the right to chase this marauding expedition upon the high seas; had a right to capture these men and bring them home. Many will doubt whether he had the right to go on land in Nicaragua. I am not here to say that he had the legal right to do that. But, if a treaty—an inchoate treaty if you please—existed between this Government and Nicaragua, by which we are to protect the transit route, the instructions of the Secretary of the Navy and of the President of the United States, in view of carrying out this treaty, warranted Commodore Paulding in going on land and thus preventing, perhaps, a war with England, and certainly an invasion of this weak people. And, sir, I say it behooves the American Congress to sustain our President and to sustain Commodore Paulding.

The only party, on the face of the globe, that has any right to object to this act of Commodore Paulding, is the weak Power of Nicaragua—a Power that commends the act; and it certainly does not behoove the American Congress by any act to justify conduct which was against our treaty stipulations, and against the law of nations.

Now, sir, the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] yesterday, in the course of his remarks, referred to the sympathy manifested in this country for Poland and Hungary. Sir, that was a generous and noble sympathy. It was the sympathy of the American nation in favor of an oppressed people striving to throw off the shackles by which they were bound by the despotic Governments of Austria and Russia; but, sir, I am not aware that there was any attempt in the American Congress to legalize the fitting out and sending off of an expedition from our shores to their assistance. There was no attempt to recognize by acts or deeds any interference upon the part of our people, in obtaining the freedom of Poland or Hungary.

The gentleman also referred to Lafayette. Sir, his was a noble and generous sympathy. It was the same sympathy in our behalf which was enlisted here on behalf of Poland and Hungary. Would either of these instances bear any parallel with this outlawed expedition of General Walker?

But, sir, the immediate cause of my rising to address the House to-day, were the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] against Commodore Paulding, who is my constituent, and whom it is my duty, in my feeble way, to defend. He expressed an opinion, and I concede to him the right to do it, and I know he is liberal enough to concede to me the same right of the expression of my opinion in opposition to his. The gentleman from Georgia said on this floor, yesterday, that "General Walker was a better man than Commodore Paulding." It is to that remark I take exception. I deny that he is a better man than Commodore Paulding. Who is General Walker? The first I ever heard of him was that at the head of a few dozen adventurers he descended upon Sonora, where he met with defeat. The next I heard of him he made a descent upon Nicaragua, where he met with a temporary success. At the head of that Government the first thing he did to prove his statesmanship and generalship was to levy upon the steamers belonging to the Transit Company, thus cutting off all communication between his own army and those who might have afforded him supplies in men and ammunition from the States, thus paving the way to his downfall and the downfall of the men who were with him.

The next you hear of General Walker is in the report of the Secretary of the Navy; and I desire to call the attention of the House to the language there used, relative to General Walker, for the purpose of proving that the doctrine of reparation cannot be applied in justice and equity to General Walker. The Secretary of the Navy says:

"The unsatisfactory state of affairs in New Granada and portions of Central America required the increase of this squadron, and the almost constant presence of a considerable force in the neighborhood, both on the Atlantic and the Pacific. * * * * *

"All these men were brought home without previous orders; but such was their deplorable condition, that it was an act of humanity which could not and ought not to be dispensed with; and the Department approved it. The expense of providing for them necessary food, clothing, and medicine, while on shipboard, amounted to $7,376 16, for which an appropriation is recommended. * * * * *

"It was deemed necessary, as a measure of humanity and policy, to direct Commodore Mervine to give General Walker and such of his men, citizens of the United States, as were willing to embrace it, an opportunity to retreat from Nicaragua. Before these instructions were received, Commodore Mervine had sent Commander Davis, with the St. Mary's, to San Juan del Sur, with instructions to protect the persons and property of American citizens. With this authority only, Commander Davis negotiated with General Walker terms of capitulation, under which he surrendered with his men, and was conveyed to Panama, whence he proceeded to the United States. Commander Davis also received from General Walker the surrender of a small schooner which he had detained, called the Granada, and delivered her to the Nicaraguan authorities. The action of Commander Davis, so far as he aided General Walker and his men, by the use of the St. Mary's, to retreat from Nicaragua and return to the United States, was approved by the Department; but his interference with the Granada, and her transfer to the Nicaraguan authorities, by his intervention, was not approved. The whole number of men surrendered and carried to Panama was about three hundred and sixty-four. Commodore Mervine, finding his squadron suddenly incumbered with these men, in the most wretched condition, suffering for the want of everything, and endangering the health of those under his command, had no mode of relief except by turning them adrift, which was impossible, or sending them by the railway to Aspinwall. Adopting the latter alternative, he was under the necessity of drawing on the Department, in favor of the railway company, for $7,475, being the amount which would be due for transporting them across the Isthmus at the usual rate of charge. This bill has neither been paid, accepted, nor protested. The company voluntarily relinquished the personal responsibility of Commodore Mervine, and put the bill at the disposal of the Government. I submit it, with an expression of my conviction that Congress should make reasonable provision for it; and also for the expenses of providing these men while on shipboard with necessary food, clothing, and medicine, of which an estimate will hereafter be furnished."

I saw the remnant of Walker's deluded followers, who were landed at the port of New York, in the Park, and a more abject and pitiable sight I never beheld. These poor fellows were without shoes or stockings, without any clothing, indeed, other than their shirts and pantaloons, and covered with lice and the scurvy. Since then many, very many of them, have been delivered from their sufferings, and have gone to "The undiscover'd country, from whose bourne No traveler returns."

General Walker cannot say of these men, like Macbeth—

"Thou canst not say, I did it: never shake Thy gory locks at me."

Now, sir, who is Commodore Paulding, a constituent of mine of whom I am justly proud? He is the son of that John Paulding, of revolutionary memory, who, with Williams and Van Wirt, captured Major André, at André's Brook, near Sleepy Hollow, Westchester county—a spot with which I am as familiar as with this Hall. These men were penniless soldiers attached to the continental army. It is said that they were playing a friendly game of "old sledge," when they espied André upon horseback, who, though a brave and a courteous gentleman, was nevertheless an English spy. They arrested him, and searched his person.

Sir, John Paulding, the father of Commodore Paulding, had no search-warrant, no special directions from the Government to do what he did. He had nothing from the Continental Congress authorizing him to arrest and search André. André offered these three honest patriots gold enough to make them independent for life, to let him pass; but they spurned the bribe. They took him to the American army, where he was tried, convicted, and hung.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question? I ask whether this spirit of committing offenses against the law of nations runs in the family?

Mr. HASKIN. I am now, Mr. Chairman, merely comparing the history of Paulding with that of Walker. Commodore Paulding has a prouder ancestry than any king or kaiser of Europe. He has been in the naval service of the United States for forty years, and, during that time, has worked his way by gallantry and efficient service to the highest rank in it. There is neither blot nor blemish upon his escutcheon. It is then unfair and ungenerous, comparing the records of Paulding with Walker, to say that the latter is the better man.

In reference to this act of Commodore Paulding, I believe that no other act since the inauguration of the existing Administration has reflected more honor and credit upon the country; and I sincerely trust that the responsible majority of this House will not fritter away that honor and credit by any resolution of censure against Commodore Paulding. The act meets with the hearty approval, I am sure, of the conservative men of the country, and the fair men all over the civilized world. Nay, sir, I would go further than many Democrats in the North on this subject. I recollect that Congress, in 1854, gave a medal to Commander Ingraham, with the thanks of Congress for what he did—protecting an inchoate American citizen (Koszta) in foreign waters and in a foreign land. I am willing now that we shall vote our thanks and a medal to Commodore Paulding. I beg the gentlemen of the South not to believe that I am in the least tainted with any sickly sentimentality on the subject of filibustering. I am a national filibuster, but am against individual filibustering, which retards the consummation of my desire with regard to Central America and other territories which we ought to have. I believe that the time has come when the application of the doctrines promulgated by the Ostend manifesto is necessary for the protection and preservation of our Pacific possessions and the continuance of our commercial rights in that quarter.

Mr. KEITT. If the gentleman will allow me. He says that he is a national filibuster, but against individual ones. I wish to know whether he is for the nation breaking faith, and against individuals so doing?

Mr. HASKIN. I am for the nation keeping its faith. I am for the nation doing as Great Britain has done. I am for the nation seizing upon Cuba, and, for that purpose, suspending the neutrality law. I am a national filibuster, and will go with the gentleman from South Carolina to that extent. And let me say that northern Democrats are right on the subject. They believe that they have come by this feeling naturally from their mother country, the country which gave to the South her cavaliers, and to the North a great many of her puritans and roundheads. We northern Democrats believe that the Government should, by conquest, do certain things; but that this business of Walker was committing petty larceny. We northern Democrats are rather in favor of national grand larceny. [Laughter.] Permit me to say that England has been the greatest filibustering country upon the face of the earth. Look at her recent conduct in China. Look at her conduct in obtaining her East India possessions, and more recently in taking possession of the Island of Perim. England did not act as Walker and his expedition did; but the navy, the Government of England did it. They wanted the island as a national naval depot, and they took the responsibility of taking it. Let our country take the responsibility of raising this same standard, and you will find thousands of the national Democrats of the North with it, because they believe it is the manifest destiny of this Republic. They believe that—

"No pent up Utica contracts our powers;
The whole boundless continent is ours."

In the remarks I have made, I have simply desired to define my position in the defense of my constituent, Commodore Paulding. I have not desired to give offense to any gentleman upon this floor. I desired to put myself upon the record as a pure, hard-shell national Democrat, sustaining right.

Mr. GILMER obtained the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me a moment?

Mr. GILMER. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I merely wish to say, in reply to the gentleman from New York, that in what I said in reference to Commodore Paulding yesterday, I meant no imputation upon his character, further than was warranted from the arrest of Walker—the transaction about which I was then speaking. That act was certainly without law, and without color of law, as I understand it. Upon that ground he is to stand in the public estimation. As to his ancestry, or his honorable life past, I meant to cast no imputation whatever. It may be that he comes from a grandfather who has had the honor of having refused a bribe. Well, sir, if that goes to his credit, let it. I cast no imputation upon Commodore Paulding, further than this act of his was concerned—an act which, in my opinion, was a great outrage.

The gentleman has alluded to the character of Walker and his followers. He spoke of the condition in which he saw some of those followers last spring, who were returned to this country, when there had been an illegal interference upon the part of Commander Davis. He says they were in want, afflicted with scurvy, and lousy. What put these men in that unfortunate condition in which he saw them, I know not. But, if they were destitute, who made them so? Perhaps they had been robbed. But, if so; who did it? I have heard some say that those now at Norfolk are poor and "lazy and lousy." I believe they were last seen under the command and control of some of the officers of the Navy. Where they got their disease or their vermin, I do not know. I do not know, but suppose that these officers, looking upon their wants and wretchedness, would, in the language of Macbeth, quoted by the gentleman, as readily as Walker, exclaim:

"Thou canst not say we did it!"

I mean, then, no imputation upon the character of Commodore Paulding, further than this act warranted my judgment. It is past, and I stand upon what I say—that this was a great outrage on private rights; and if it appears that the arrest was illegal, as such it ought to be redressed.

Mr. HASKIN. With the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] I desire to say, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, that even though this act of Commodore Paulding may not have been strictly within the legal purview of his authority, yet there are abundant precedents where the American Congress and the American people have sustained an act which was right morally, though technically and legally wrong. General Jackson, when he declared martial law in New Orleans, was in the commission of, and did commit, an illegal act. He was tried for it, and was fined; but he lived long enough afterwards to become President of the United States, and to have the fine repaid by order of the American Congress. There are many cases where men in our Navy have gone as far as Commodore Paulding went in this case, and where the Government have approved their acts. On this head I will read an extract which I have before me:

"Commodore Paulding, if necessary, will find abundant authentic precedents to sustain him. About the year 1826, Commodore David Porter was dispatched to the Caribbean seas, to suppress acts of piracy that were almost daily perpetrated on the commerce of the world in that quarter. He came across a band of pirates, who, on hot pursuit, abandoned their schooners and shallops, and took to the island of Porto Rico—an island within the jurisdiction of a State of Europe, with which we held friendly relations—and found safety and succor in the town of Foxardo.

"Commodore Porter, deeming himself in pursuit of common freebooters, pirates, and outlaws, did not hesitate to land on the island of Porto Rico, where he pursued the delinquents, and extended to them the full measure of his indignation. For this act he was called home; subjected to a court of inquiry, and honorably acquitted, though warmly and strongly censured. The administration of Mr. Adams was disposed to treat him with severity; but, public opinion, the nation at large, and the subsequent administration of General Jackson, applauded and rewarded him.

"The conduct of Commodore Paulding finds precedent in that of Commodore Downes at Qualla Bartoo, in that of Commodore Porter at the Fejee Islands, in that of the commodore of the frigate Vincennes, in the Borco Tagus, and, more recently, in that of Commodore Collins, at Greytown.

"The only difficulty connected with this matter consists in the undecided fact of the real character of General Walker and his followers. If Walker is, or ever was, Chief Executive of the Republic of Nicaragua, he holds a position in the embryo State that absolves him from the odium of a pirate and an outlaw, though the fact does not hold him up to the world as a recognized chieftain, civil or military, de facto."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. In the very case cited by the gentleman, the conduct of Commodore Porter at Foxardo cost him his position. He was court-martialed, and dismissed from the Navy.

Mr. HASKIN. That is true, under the Administration of Mr. Adams; but the admiration and approval of the nation was so strong that, under the administration of Jackson, the act was applauded, and he was rewarded for it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. He never was restored. Repeated applications were made for his restoration to the Navy, but he never was restored; and that was a case where he pursued pirates and robbers.

Mr. HASKIN. The only difference between us—the conservative national Democrats of the North and the gentleman—is, that the gentleman views Walker as a general, while we view him as a quixotic adventurer and marauder. That is the conservative sentiment among the Democrats of the North.

Mr. GILMER resumed the floor.

Mr. BOCK. I ask the favor of the gentleman from North Carolina to allow me to say two sentences, and only two.

Mr. GILMER. I desire to submit a few remarks only, and I shall speak but fifteen minutes. The gentleman will then have an opportunity to say what he desires.

Mr. BOCK. I do not want to make a speech. I merely wish to reply to a remark made by the gentleman from Georgia in reference to the naval officers.

Mr. GILMER. Very well; one moment.

Mr. BOCK. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] said, in the course of his remarks, that it had been stated that these men of Walker's at Norfolk were wretched, naked, lazy, and lousy, and that the last company which he had heard of their being in was the company of certain naval officers. I merely wish to say, in reply to that, that my position in this House and in former Houses, has brought me a good deal into contact with officers of the Navy. I have associated with a great many of them, and I have never found any of them in that condition. If the gentleman from Georgia has found naval officers in that condition, all that I can say is, that I am sorry for his associations among them. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILMER. I rise, sir, not to discuss the Dred Scott decision, for it was remarked by a gentleman at my elbow, that he thought it would be prudent, in order to save time, to alter the rules of this House, and set apart a day in every month to be devoted to the discussion of the negro question; and another gentleman at my elbow remarked that it should be on Friday, and should be called "black Friday." [A laugh.]

I do not rise to discuss or to answer that which I conceive to be a monstrous proposition—that there is that peculiarity in the Constitution of our Government that it does not possess the power, by the legislation of Congress, to enforce the international laws, and to compel the obedience thereto of the citizens of the Union. Mr. Chairman, if that be so, I think the mere statement of the proposition furnishes an answer to it to every reflecting mind; but, if that be so, then it suggests to my mind the great importance of giving this Government more power, and of altering our Constitution.

But, sir, inasmuch as no voice has been raised in this committee from that section of country from which I come, in behalf of Commodore Paulding, I have risen simply to express my sympathy with the two gentlemen from the State of New York, who have spoken to-day in his behalf. I have seen nothing as yet, sir, that I think justifies a course of argument involving so much criticism, casting reflection on a gentleman whose history and character, so far as I know anything of them, show him to be a praiseworthy officer of our Navy; and I conceive that when this whole matter is understood, when we receive from the Executive the information we desire, when we see the instructions under which Commodore Paulding acted in all that he did, it will be found that it does not amount to a case in which any censure can be cast upon him. I have no doubt, from what we learn in the message, from what we learn from other quarters, from the history of a few years past, that he acted under instructions; and I beg leave here to dissent entirely from the intimation of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] that there was any impropriety in giving such instructions to the naval officers or any other officers of the nation after Mr. Walker had given bail, as it is called, to answer to a criminal charge.

In my judgment, that increased the necessity for the Executive to give instructions to the officers of the Government to exercise greater vigilance. Why, sir, suppose that a client were to come to me or to the gentleman from Georgia, and state a case of this kind: that he had brought a civil suit and that the party who had become bail in that suit was insolvent; that the defendant was good, but that he had sold his property and was about to depart the country to parts unknown; would the gentleman, or would I, or would any lawyer stand up in this House and say that he could not, under that rule which comes up to supply deficiencies in the law, where, by reason of its universality, it is weak, devise some process, even although bail had been given, to save that client and keep the defendant in the country? I was astonished that my friend from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] showed some hesitation in answering some of the questions in reference to this point which were gravely thrust at him during the discussion yesterday.

What sort of bail did this man Walker enter into? It was not bail, in the common sense of the term. It was what lawyers understand to be a recognizance to answer the charge of the United States against him. Would my friend from Georgia stand up here, as a lawyer, and say before this committee, that if a man indicted, committed upon inquiry, or upon the finding of a grand jury, were brought before a judge and entered into recognizance, or gave security to answer to the charge, and before he departed the court should be heard to mutter, "I intend to disregard the recognizance; I have got friends to pay the money; I do not intend to be here in obedience to that recognizance when the call is made; I mean to go about my own business;" would my friend say that the judge of that court would not have power to say that the man must be retained, unless he increased the recognizance? But supposing he had departed, and it came to the knowledge of the judge, upon the application of a solicitor, by affidavit or otherwise, that the accused intended to disregard the authority of the court and forfeit his recognizance: would the gentleman from Georgia say that our criminal law, both State and Federal, is so much of a cobweb, and so weak, that a judge has to hold his hand and say that he can do nothing to maintain the law? Why, sir, the very fact that the party accused gives indications of an intention to disregard the recognizance, in my humble judgment, calls for more vigilance, more care, more circumspection and firmness, on the part of the Executive, to issue his orders to all the officers of the Government, whether civil or military, to arrest him who attempts to escape from the jurisdiction in which he has given bonds to answer.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to make one remark. The gentleman from North Carolina has alluded to my hesitation as to what the law is in cases of recognizance. That I care nothing about; but I wish to call the attention of the gentleman and of the House to the fact that since the discussion yesterday I have had occasion to turn to the statute relating to this subject, and I find that the tenth section of this neutrality law directs the court before whom a party is brought who has been arrested for a breach of its provisions, to require him to give bonds, or enter into recognizance, not only for his appearance, but that he will be of good behavior, and not violate the neutrality laws pending the prosecution; and therefore, in this case of Walker, the recognizance was broken the moment he left the shores of the United States, and became a fugitive.

Mr. GILMER. I will merely remark that I have not a word of censure to utter against the act of the Executive in issuing orders to his subordinates to increase their vigilance, after it was ascertained that General Walker had left our shores with an armed body of men, and that, too, in the very direction that it was the object of the Government to keep him from going in. Sir, what does this amount to?

As has been already remarked, the whole matter will turn upon a mere legal technicality. There is such a thing as trespass without damage—damnum absque injuria. When a man's cattle escape from him and go upon his neighbor's inclosure, and he sends his servants after them to bring them back, they, entering upon his neighbor's ground, commit a trespass, as the law presumes, by treading down his grass and herbage; and, although the object was to get away the cattle, which were eating the crops, still, if the owner of that field should be querulous enough and litigious enough to bring a suit against his neighbor for trespassing upon his land, you, as judge, would have to charge the jury that he was entitled to his miserable sixpence nominal damages, because the law so implied; but I imagine the jurors, the bystanders, and neighbors, would be very apt to step forward and pay all the costs and damages.

Sir, if there has been any error upon the part of Commodore Paulding in this matter, it has been an over zeal in the discharge of his duties. Had I been in Commodore Paulding's place, after the criticism that had been made in the United States upon the failure of the commanding officer of the Saratoga to arrest Walker and his men, and after what appears in the message of the Executive, I would have done as he did, and would have thought that I was doing that which would be more acceptable to the Government and people of the United States than could be done by any other man under the circumstances; and I have no doubt he thought so. In doing so, he may have committed this little trespass—for, mark you, there is in the law of nations as in the common law the maxim de minimis lex non curat, and I have no doubt the maxim is properly applicable to the case of Commodore Paulding.

Mr. Chairman, suppose Walker had come to North Carolina, and had persuaded off some three or four hundred of the slaves of my constituents; suppose, after he had got them on board the vessel, he had been arrested and held to bail in the sum of $2,500, but still went on with the three hundred negroes from North Carolina. He is out on the ocean somewhere. The President hears of the circumstances, and tells Commodore Paulding to keep a look out for this man. He gets on his trail and pursues him in hot haste but cannot get his hand upon him until he is within a marine league of Nova Scotia. I venture to say that if Commodore Paulding, under these circumstances, had gone in and grappled Walker and these negroes on the very beach of Nova Scotia and brought them back to North Carolina, our southern politicians would say that he had been doing a good thing for his country. Although under the law of England whatever human being puts his foot upon the soil of her dominions is free, be he white or black; and although these negroes would have come under the operation of that maxim, I imagine that none of our southern politicians would be heard complaining that Paulding was getting this country into trouble, or was not a generous man. No, sir. But I was going to remark that the man who would censure the conduct of Paulding in that instance for going on to the beach of Nova Scotia—when he did not cut down a shrub, when he did not carry off even a log, but only left his modest foot-prints upon the sand—I do not know whether we in North Carolina would speak of that man as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] spoke of Walker, as one who ought to be stretched up and hung, but we would say of him that he was a mighty hot Abolitionist—[Laughter]—and that we consider the worst thing you can say of a man in our country.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that in advance of the information which we want, our friends from the section of the country from which I am proud to be a Representative, have felt themselves at liberty to indulge in a criticism, which, I think, they will, in the end, be generous enough to say was uncalled for.

What a curious idea it is, that this country is bound to carry Walker back under the circumstances, in a national ship, to pay his expenses, to salute his flag! Why, Mr. Chairman, there is a resolution in this celebrated Cincinnati platform, which has created a great deal of difficulty in its construction; but I think that this debate, and the intense anxiety that has been manifested to carry Walker back and pay his expenses, would cast some light upon a point which I have heretofore considered a rather harmless, though somewhat mysterious portion of this Cincinnati platform. [Laughter.] It is the last resolution but two as published among the people where I live. We afterwards understood that there were some others attached about the Pacific railroad, which were never published in the southern country, and denied to be a part of the platform. [Great laughter.] The meaning of it varies with the punctuation and emphasis you give it. The resolution to which I refer is in the following words:

"3. Resolved, That the great highway which nature, as well as the assent of the States most immediately interested in its maintenance, has marked out for the free communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, constitutes one of the most important achievements to be realized by the spirit of moderation in the unconquerable energy of our people, and that result should be secured by a timely and efficient exertion of the control which we have the right to claim over it. And no power on earth should be suffered to impede or clog its progress by any interference with relations that it may suit our policy to establish with the Government of the States within whose dominion it lies; and we can, under no circumstances, surrender our preponderance in the adjustment of all questions arising out of it."

Now, sir, some words indicate, what we all concur in, that an acquisition of a free transit there is of vast importance, almost indispensable to the true interests of this country; and some portion of it would indicate that it is to be acquired peaceably, at least not by petty larceny, but by grand larceny. But, let Walker be carried back under these circumstances; let him be carried back in a national fleet; and let this apology be made, and then we will have all got a construction given to this resolution of the Cincinnati platform.

I think, sir, that it is time enough for us to complain, as has been remarked with much force, when Nicaragua complains; and if there is anything to be gained by filibustering in that quarter, beneficial to the Union or to the southern States, just let Nicaragua ask us to make the apology indicated by the gentleman from Georgia; then, when they ask us to make that apology, all of us who want any further filibustering will have a good excuse by carrying out this demand for apology and for reparation. That would be to send Walker out there, and not only let the men who went with him, but others who have an inkling that way, go too. [Laughter.]

And unless General Walker can keep up this train of misfortune, which has followed him for the last three or four years, I think he could benefit Nicaragua some. I have no sympathy with him. I have nothing to charge personally or politically against him, but am here to say that, in my humble judgment, taking this whole case as it stands before us, we ought not to pass censure upon an officer who has, according to all accounts, always borne himself well.

Mr. THAYER obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. BILLINGHURST, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. PHELPS) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SECURITY OF STEAMBOAT PASSENGERS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move, Mr. Speaker, to reconsider the vote by which the further consideration of the bill for the protection of passengers on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, was postponed to the first Tuesday in February; and also move that the House adjourn.

Mr. REILLY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his latter motion until I can withdraw some papers from the files of the House, that they may be sent in to the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, withdrew his motion to adjourn.

Leave was then granted for the withdrawal of the papers referred to from the files of the House, for the purpose indicated.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, the motion to reconsider made by the gentleman from Illinois, is one which ought to be disposed of at once, because, if allowed to remain pending, it will put it in the power of those who may be disposed to press this bill before other measures in the morning hour, or at any other time, to call it up. It acts as a special order. My opinion is that the motion ought now to be acted on. I am in favor of reconsidering the vote by which the bill was made a special order, in order to move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If, however, this is a bill which demands immediate action, let the House so determine, and the bill can be disposed of at once, without reference to a committee.

But to keep the bill pending, as the gentleman proposes, is not treating the House fairly; nor is it just in reference to the other bills which are before the House. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois will give the friends of the bill the control of the entire business of the House, at least for such time as may be consumed in its passage. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, the House then (at twenty minutes past three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 7, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. T. H. Bockock, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.
Hon. D. L. YULEE, of Florida, appeared in his seat.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DIXON presented the petition of Samuel Colt, praying for an extension of his patent for an improvement in fire-arms; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. KING presented a memorial of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms, and granted free of cost to actual settlers who are not possessed of other lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of Charles Fairbanks and others, praying for an extension of the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. IVERSON presented an additional paper in relation to the claim of John W. Phillips; which, with his memorial on file, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. POLK presented the petition of Henry D. V. Hinman, a soldier in the war of 1812, praying that a pension of eight dollars a month may be granted to him and the other soldiers of that war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Joseph Hardy and Alton Long, praying for the return of rent collected by the agents of the United States for the working of mines not the property of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SEWARD. I present a petition of citizens of the State of New York, residing in the town of Canandaigua, who pray the Senate to bring forward some practical measure by which the people of the North may cooperate in a generous and brotherly spirit with the people of the South, in gradually extinguishing slavery, by a fair and honorable compensation to the slaveholding States for the manumission of their slaves. As, from the reception which other petitions of this class have met with here, there is probably no committee to which it will be acceptable, I therefore move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. EVANS presented the credentials of Hon. JAMES H. HAMMOND, chosen by the Legislature of South Carolina, Senator from that State, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. A. P. Butler, for the term ending on the 3d of March, 1861; which were read, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. HAMMOND, he took his seat in the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Otway H. Berryman, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BELL, it was

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Anthony W. Bayard, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of the Academy of Natural Sciences, of Philadelphia, for the printing of Dr. John Evans's report of his geological surveys in Oregon and Washington Territories, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Printing; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of the United States, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms, and granted to actual settlers free of cost, reported that legislation on the subject was not requisite, and therefore asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William B. Davis, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Craton W. Brant, and the papers in relation to the claim of William Smith; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel and William P. Draper, praying that a register may be granted to the bark Jehu, a Dominican vessel, late called the Naiad Queen, reported a bill (S. No. 50) to authorize the issuing of a register to the bark Jehu; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, who were, by a resolution of the Senate, instructed to inquire into the subject, reported a bill (S. No. 51) to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer Fearless; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a joint resolution (S. No. 5) to authorize certain officers and men engaged in the search for Sir John Franklin, to receive certain medals presented to them by the Government of Great Britain; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. SLIDELL, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MALLORY, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 49) to provide for the construction of a court-house, post office, and custom-house, in Appalachicola, in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 48) for the construction of a marine hospital at Appalachicola, in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 47) confirming the location of land warrants under certain circumstances; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EMIGRANT PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of the correspondence with, and dispatches from, our Ministers at the Courts of England, France, Switzerland, and other Powers, on the subject of the dangers to emigrants arising from the practice of contracting with irresponsible parties in Europe for American inland passage tickets.

COMMISSIONERS TO CHINA.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, all the official dispatches and correspondence of the Hon. Robert McLane, and of the Hon. Peter Parker, late Commissioners to China, with the State Department.

STEAMER INSPECTORS.

Mr. MALLORY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire as to the expediency of providing for the appointment of inspectors of the hulls and boilers of steamers in the collection districts of the State of Florida.

NAVIGATION LAWS.

Mr. TOOMBS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of modifying or repealing the navigation laws, and report by bill or otherwise.

MINISTER TO JAPAN.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. GWIN on Tuesday last:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of a Minister Plenipotentiary to the Empire of Japan.

Mr. MASON. I suggest that the resolution be modified so as simply to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for this object.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia to include in his amendment a proposition to make an appropriation for other American officers in the Japanese Empire. That will bring up for the consideration of the committee the question whether there should not be some compensation allowed to our Commissioner and our consul general who are there. It seems to me the whole subject had better go to the committee together.

Mr. MASON. I have no objection to that modification. I do not see in his seat the Senator who moved the resolution, but I am satisfied he will not object to it. I move to amend the resolution so that it shall read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation by law for the compensation of a Minister Plenipotentiary to the Empire of Japan.

Mr. HAMLIN. My amendment is to add: "And for other officers of the United States Government in Japan."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. MASON. My only object in offering the amendment was to make the resolution conform to what I understand to be the relations of the legislative department in reference to missions abroad; we can do no more than make an appropriation for them. I am not at all satisfied either of the expediency or propriety just now of making such an appropriation in this case; but I stated to the honorable Senator who moved the resolution that I would not object to the inquiry.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

ALEXANDER J. ATOTCHA.

Mr. FOOT. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary request the return to the Senate, from the Court of Claims, of the bill (S. No. 28) for the relief of Alexander J. Atotcha, together with the report of the committee, and the papers relating to the case.

I ask for the consideration of the resolution at this time, as I shall follow it up by a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate in this case.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MASON. The honorable Senator from Vermont was good enough to make this motion, he having voted in the majority, at the instance of some gentlemen, of whom I am one, who are very desirous that this subject should be again before the Senate. The only mode of doing it, as I am informed, is to pass this resolution, in order to bring the subject in a condition for reconsideration. Whether the Senate will reconsider it or not, is for them to decide; but if the motion be not made to-day, three days will have elapsed since the bill was disposed of, and it cannot be made at all. I hope the Senate will adopt the resolution.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Virginia is right, as to the effect of this proposition; but if the sense of the Senate is now decidedly against the reconsideration, it can as well be determined on this resolution; so I think the vote had better be taken on it as a test question. If there is no disposition to reconsider the subject at all, let this resolution be voted down, and that will be an end of the matter.

Mr. MASON. If the sense of the Senate is decidedly against entertaining this claim, of course the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Michigan is perfectly sound; but I am not aware of an instance in which the Senate has refused to reconsider, on the request of any Senator who feels himself earnestly desirous that another opportunity should be had for bringing a question before the Senate. There is no commitment by a reconsideration.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No motion to reconsider is before the Senate. The question is on the resolution requesting the return of the papers from the Court of Claims.

Mr. HUNTER. I raise a question of order. The papers have been committed to the Court of Claims, and we cannot recall them. We might, within the time limited by the rule, have reconsidered the order sending the case to the Court of Claims, but we cannot now remand the papers.

Mr. JONES. It was often done last year.

Mr. MASON. I can say to my honorable colleague that this has been done by the Senate over and over again, and it is the only means by which the public business can be discharged. It is perfectly competent for the Senate to refuse to recall these papers; but the same thing has been done over and over again in other cases. It is the only means by which the object can be attained.

Mr. HUNTER. I was not aware of the precedent. Is my colleague sure that it was not done in the cases to which he alludes, by way of reconsideration? If we can recall these papers we can recall any other papers. It seems to me that there is but one way in which we can undo the work we have done, and that is by reconsideration. This, however, is an original proceeding, and I do not see why we may not call for other papers as well as these. To end the matter and test the sense of the Senate, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ALLEN and Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Biggs, Chandler, Collamer, Davis, Doollittle, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Stuart, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Broderick, Brown, Clark, Clay, Crittenden, Dixon, Douglas, Fitch, Foster, Gwin, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wilson—22.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with certain resolutions of the Senate, information in relation to affairs in Kansas.

Mr. PUGH. I suggest that it be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move the reference of the report to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I suggest that the proposition to print be referred to the Committee on Printing. I will state that, for the accommodation of all, we can have it printed, and brought before us, by the next meeting of the Senate. The committee are probably able to report on it now.

The message was referred to the Committee on Territories, and the motion to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the consent of the Senate, by the authority of the Committee on Printing, to report in favor of printing the message.

The report was agreed to.

ARREST OF WILLIAM WALKER.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, in response to a resolution calling for copies of all orders, instructions, and correspondence, with reference to the recent arrest of William Walker and his associates, on the coast of Central America.

The message was read, and is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In submitting to the Senate the papers for which they have called, I deem it proper to make a few observations.

In capturing General Walker and his command, after they had landed on the soil of Nicaragua, Commodore Paulding has, in my opinion, committed a grave error. It is quite evident, however, from the communications herewith transmitted, that this was done from pure and patriotic motives, and in the sincere conviction that he was promoting the interests and vindicating the honor of his country. In regard to Nicaragua, she has sustained no injury by the act of Commodore Paulding. This has inured to her benefit, and relieved her from a dreaded invasion. She alone would have any right to complain of the violation of her territory; and it is quite certain she will never exercise this right. It unquestionably does not lie in the mouth of her invaders to complain in her name that she has been rescued by Commodore Paulding from their assaults. The error of this gallant officer consists in exceeding his instructions, and landing his sailors and marines in Nicaragua, whether with or without her consent, for the purpose of making war upon any military force whatever which he might find in the country, no matter from whence they came. This power certainly did not belong to him. Obedience to law and conformity to instructions are the best and safest guides for all officers, civil and military, and when they transcend these limits, and act upon their own personal responsibility, evil consequences almost inevitably follow.

Under these circumstances, when Marshal Ryn- ders presented himself at the State Department on the 20th ultimo, with General Walker in custody, the Secretary informed him that the executive department of the Government did not recognize General Walker as a prisoner; that it had no directions to give concerning him; and that it is only through the action of the judiciary that he could be lawfully held in custody to answer any charges that might be brought against him.

In thus far disapproving the conduct of Commodore Paulding, no inference must be drawn that I am less determined than I ever have been to execute the neutrality laws of the United States. This is my imperative duty; and I shall continue to perform it by all the means which the Constitution and the laws have placed in my power.

My opinion of the value and importance of these laws corresponds entirely with that expressed by Mr. Monroe, in his message to Congress of December 7, 1819. That wise, prudent, and patriotic statesman says: "It is of the highest importance to our national character and indispensable to the morality of our citizens that all violations of our neutrality should be prevented. No door should be left open for the evasion of our laws, no opportunity afforded to any who may be disposed to take advantage of it to compromise the interest or the honor of the nation."

The crime of setting on foot or providing the means for a military expedition within the United States to make war against a foreign State with which we are at peace, is one of an aggravated and dangerous character, and early engaged the attention of Congress. Whether the executive Government possesses any, or what power, under the Constitution, independently of Congress, to prevent or punish this and similar offenses against the law of nations, was a subject which engaged the attention of our most eminent statesmen in the time of the Administration of General Washington, and on the occasion of the French revolution. The act of Congress of the 5th of June, 1794, fortunately removed all the difficulties on this question which had theretofore existed. The fifth and seventh sections of this act, which relate to the present question, are the same in substance with the sixth and eighth sections of the act of April 20, 1818, and have now been in force for a period of more than sixty years.

The military expedition rendered criminal by the act must have its origin, must "begin," or be "set on foot," in the United States; but the great object of the law was to save foreign States with whom we were at peace from the ravages of these lawless expeditions proceeding from our shores. The seventh section alone, therefore, which simply defines the crime and its punishment, would have been inadequate to accomplish this purpose and enforce our international duties. In order to render the law effectual, it was necessary to prevent "the carrying on" of such expeditions to their consummation after they had succeeded in leaving our shores.

This has been done effectually, and in clear and explicit language, by the authority given to the President under the eighth section of the act to employ the land and naval forces of the United States "for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States against the territories or domain of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace."

For these reasons, had Commodore Paulding intercepted the steamer "Fashion," with General Walker and his command on board, at any period before they entered the port of San Juan de Nicaragua, and conducted them back to Mobile, this would have prevented them from "carrying on" the expedition, and have been not only a justifiable but a praiseworthy act.

The crime well deserves the severe punishment inflicted upon it by our laws. It violates the principles of Christianity, morality, and humanity, held sacred by all civilized nations, and by none more than by the people of the United States. Disguise it as we may, such a military expedition is an invitation to reckless and lawless men to enlist under the banner of any adventurer to rob, plunder and murder the unoffending citizens of neighboring States who have never done them harm. It is a usurpation of the war-making power, which belongs alone to Congress; and the Government itself, at least in the estimation of the world, becomes an accomplice in the commission of this crime, unless it adopts all the means necessary to prevent and to punish it. It would be far better, and more in accordance with the bold and manly character of our countrymen, for the Government itself to get up such expeditions than to allow them to proceed under the command of irresponsible adventurers. We could then, at least, exercise some control over our own agents, and prevent them from burning down cities and committing other acts of enormity of which we have read.

The avowed principle which lies at the foundation of the law of nations is contained in the Divine command that "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." Tried by this unerring rule, we should be severely condemned if we shall not use our best exertions to arrest such expeditions against our feeble sister Republic of Nicaragua. One thing is very certain, that people never existed who would call any other nation to a stricter account than we should ourselves, for tolerating lawless expeditions from their shores to make war upon any portion of our territories.

By tolerating such expeditions, we shall soon lose the high character which we have enjoyed ever since the days of Washington, for the faithful performance of our international obligations and duties, and inspire distrust against us among the members of the great family of civilized nations.

But if motives of duty were not sufficient to restrain us from engaging in such lawless enterprises, our evident interest ought to dictate this policy. These expeditions are the most effectual mode of retarding American progress; although to promote this is the avowed object of the leaders and contributors in such undertakings.

It is beyond question the destiny of our race to spread themselves over the continent of North America, and this at no distant day, should events be permitted to take their natural course. The tide of emigration will flow to the South, and nothing can eventually arrest its progress. If permitted to go there, peacefully, Central America will soon contain an American population, which will confer blessings and benefits as well upon the natives as their respective Governments. Liberty, under the restraint of law, will preserve domestic peace; whilst the different transit routes across the isthmus, in which we are so deeply interested, will have assured protection.

Nothing has retarded this happy condition of affairs so much as the unlawful expeditions which have been fitted out in the United States to make war upon the Central American States. Had one half of the number of American citizens who have miserably perished in the first disastrous expedition of General Walker settled in Nicaragua as peaceful emigrants, the object which we all desire would ere this have been, in a great degree, accomplished. These expeditions have caused the people of the Central American States to regard us with dread and suspicion. It is our true policy to remove this apprehension, and to convince them that we intend to do them good, and not evil. We desire, as the leading Power on this continent, to open, and, if need be, to protect every transit route across the isthmus, not only for our own benefit, but that of the world, and thus open a free access to Central America, and through it to our Pacific possessions. This policy was commenced under favorable auspices, when the expedition, under the command of General Walker, escaped from our territories and proceeded to Punta Arenas. Should another expedition of a similar character again evade the vigilance of our officers and proceed to Nicaragua, this would be fatal, at least for a season, to the peaceful settlement of these countries and to the policy of American progress. The truth is, that no Administration can successfully conduct the foreign affairs of the country in Central America, or anywhere else, if it is to be interfered with at every step by lawless military expeditions "set on foot" in the United States.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, January 7, 1858.

Mr. MASON. I rise only to move that the communication be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the accompanying documents.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I wish to make one or two remarks before this matter passes from the Senate. I must dissent from the conclusion of the President, that the grant of the right to use the Army and Navy enlarged his jurisdiction and conferred upon the Executive powers which he did not possess under the law. He assumes that the neutrality law, which required that these expeditions should be suppressed, when it had added thereto the power that he might use the Army and the Navy in the execution of the law, conferred on him authority to go beyond the jurisdiction of the United States. From that I wholly dissent. This seems to furnish us a key to the policy which sent the navy out to the coast of Central America, there to prevent illegal expeditions sailing from the United States, instead of posting them where they should have been for that purpose, at the mouth of the Mississippi, the mouth of the Alabama, and the harbor of New York. Three cities, it was known by public announcement all over the country, and three alone, contained the elements of such an expedition—New Orleans, Mobile, and New York. If it was necessary to enable the civil authorities to execute the neutrality laws of the United States, the fleet should have been stationed there, and not upon the coast of Central America. If this expedition be all that is described, it was but a misdemeanor, an offense against the laws of the United States. The suspicion that there was a purpose thus illegally to make war upon a country with which we were at peace, would have justified their detention within the waters of the United States, in order that the case might be inquired into, but could not justify their arrest beyond the jurisdiction of the United States. They were not fugitives from justice. They were only men suspected of a misdemeanor. If we had possessed an extradition treaty that enabled us to call on the Government of Nicaragua for the return of a fugitive from justice, it would not have justified the course which has been pursued in this case. If we possess no such treaty—and such is my impression—then, though they had been fugitives from justice, they were safe from our reach as soon as they touched the soil of Nicaragua.

I cannot consent, even by my silence, to give my approbation to this extension of the power of the Federal Government by the use of the Army and Navy to perform acts the performance of which has not been devolved by law on the President. The President has no more right to make an arrest than any of those members of the Senate who are now listening to me. He has no more power to issue process, and his Navy have no more power to serve it. At most, this was but the case of an individual, in violation of the laws of the United States, departing from the United States to enter into the controversies of another country. Whatever may be his character, whatever may be his purpose, is a subject into which I do not choose to inquire. I know nothing of him. I have no sympathy with such expeditions.

I think we should execute our neutrality-law within our own limits; but I hold that the difficulty which has so often occurred, and which has so often permitted expeditions of this kind to leave the United States, is inherent in the nature of the case. Our neighbors are too weak to require that a regular armament should be fitted out, that an army should be organized for their invasion. It is not according to the theory of our Government that we should establish a system of espionage in order that we may stop any six, twenty, one hundred, or two hundred men who may choose to leave the United States, cast off their obligations to our Government, and enter into revolutionary movements elsewhere. If they claim to be emigrants, what right have we to inquire into their future motives? If they claim the right to cross Central America, what authority have we to inquire whether they may not stop upon the isthmus? They are not, in the sense in which the term was used in 1818, a military expedition, but a mere handful of adventurers upon a transport-boat going down to a landing on the coast of Central America. Such an expedition as need be fitted out to go into the harbor of Liverpool, and there make an assault, could not leave our coast without every man in the country knowing it. Such an expedition it would be perfectly within the power of the United States to suppress. But, sir, when my attention was directed to this subject some years ago, at the time of the invasion of Lower California, when we received intelligence of a handful of men, (I believe it was but a dozen,) with side-arms, going and capturing the Governor and proclaiming themselves conquerors of a State, I felt how utterly idle it was for this Government, with our right of expatriation, with the right of each and every citizen to go where he pleases, and to bear arms, to attempt to suppress such expeditions as might be made use of against the southern and Central American States.

I think, sir, we are making a great departure from those principles which have heretofore controlled our Government. We are attempting to enlarge jurisdiction to suit the exigency of the case, instead of turning back to the authority which has been conferred. If it be the will of Congress and of the country to confer on the Executive the power of keeping the police of the high seas; to give him the Army and Navy as a constabulary force to stand at foreign ports and arrest persons suspected of a misdemeanor, let it be conferred before he attempts to exercise it. That power has not been given, and I have felt it necessary thus to express my entire dissent from it.

Mr. MASON. I moved the reference of the message and documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations in order that we might have an opportunity of examining the positions taken in the message, to determine whether any further legislation is necessary to effect the objects of the neutrality laws as they are called, or whether any action on the part of the Senate ought to be recommended, differing, if we should differ, from the policy which the message seems to inculcate. I should doubt the expediency of expressing opinions upon the positions taken in the message without further and more mature deliberation. I have not understood the message correctly if the honorable Senator from Mississippi has given it its true version in this. I have not understood that the President, in his message, has said either expressly or by implication, that the command of the Army and Navy, which is given to him by the Constitution, enlarges any power that is conferred on him.

Mr. DAVIS. The eighth section of the act he speaks of as enlarging his power.

Mr. MASON. Then it may be a construction upon that act. I do not know how that is. The President is required by the Constitution to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and the Constitution gives him the command of the Army and Navy. I presume it would follow, that when the Army and Navy are given to him, he may use them, if necessary, in the execution of the laws.

Mr. DAVIS. He cannot use the Army and Navy in the execution of the law at his discretion. The mode is pointed out in which he may use the Army and Navy—not at his discretion; not where he pleases beyond the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. MASON. I certainly do not mean to convey any such impression in any way in the world. I say the Constitution has conferred the command of the Army and Navy upon him, and that the laws have directed how they shall be used. I do not say he has discretion regardless of the law.

Another position of the honorable Senator is, that the President has no power to order an arrest to be made; and yet the honorable Senator states that, under the law, the military power may be used for the purpose of preventing the departure of these expeditions from our ports. How can they be prevented from departing unless by exercising the power of arrest? Whether the President can direct a naval officer to seize a citizen of the United States, or one who has left the United States, not a citizen, upon the high seas, is a question worthy of consideration. It is one of those questions which I presume must be considered upon this reference. I do not mean to go into the general policy, because I do not think this the appropriate time, further than to say thus much: as far as my opinions are concerned I regard it as the incumbent duty of the President to see that the neutrality laws are fully executed, and we never have had a more striking instance of the wisdom and expediency of those laws in preserving the public peace than the extraordinary attempts which have been made by this man, Walker, as I fear, to bring them into jeopardy.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish to make but a single remark. The President imputes to Commodore Paulding a "grave error" in the capture of Walker and his men. I think, sir, that, from the President's own premises, such a conclusion is altogether illegal, and that, on the contrary, his conduct has been as conformable to law as his motives are supposed by the President to have been patriotic. The President says that Nicaragua, as the act was done for her benefit, can have no cause to complain, and will not complain. Then it was no breach of the neutrality of her territory. It was in itself no such breach. It was not one of those entries which constitute a violation of the neutrality of her territory. He says, that Walker and his followers have no right to complain. Of what error, then, has Commodore Paulding been guilty? I rose simply to say, that from the President's own just view of all other parts of this subject, it does most manifestly appear that his conclusion in imputing error of conduct to Commodore Paulding is altogether erroneous and illogical from his own premises.

Mr. BROWN. This question, Mr. President, stands where I have apprehended for the last three or four days it would stand. The President of the United States disapproves of the arrest of Walker, and excuses it. He disapproves of it on the ground that the arrest was in violation of law; and if it was, I hold that he has no right to excuse it. If Commodore Paulding had the right to arrest Walker in Nicaragua, his conduct ought not only to be excused, but it ought to be applauded. If, however, he had no legal right to do that act, the President of the Republic owes it to the people, whose President he is, to condemn it.

If Walker has been guilty of any violation of law, and has been arrested and brought back to our shores as a fugitive from justice, why is he not put in the clutches of the law? Why is he brought to New York, placed in the hands of the marshal, brought here, and offered to the Government, and then set at liberty? Why is he not carried to Louisiana by the same authority which arrested him, and there put upon his trial on this charge of violating the law? Sir, this is a farce being played out before the American people, disreputable to all who are engaged in it. There has been no violation of law. Those who have trumped up the charge against Walker know that there has been no violation of law. If they believe that he has violated the law, then they are grossly derelict in duty in not returning him to Louisiana, that he may be tried under the law and convicted of the offense whereof he stands charged. But he is not sent there, and that is an admission that he is not guilty, and that a conviction cannot be procured. Then he has not been brought here to answer to any indictment; for if he has, I charge again that those who brought him here are not discharging their duty.

Now, sir, I hold this to be true: that the fitting out of an expedition in violation of the neutrality laws, is one thing; that the voluntary expatriation of a citizen, is altogether another and a different thing. If Walker has fitted out an expedition against Nicaragua, or any other country at peace with the United States, he has violated the law; but if he has girt his arms about him and voluntarily gone aboard a ship going to the coast of Nicaragua, avowing to all the world that he was going there to wage war against the Government, I hold he had the right to do so. In that there is no fitting out of an expedition. I hold it to be my right under the law, to-day, to take my musket upon my shoulder, go and tell the President and his Secretary of War, his district attorneys and his marshals, everywhere, that I mean, thus accoutered, to go and take part against Nicaragua, and they have no power to arrest me. If one has the right to go, two, three, four, five, or even five hundred have the right in the same manner, each going upon his individual account.

I will tell you, sir, where I think the mistake in this whole matter lies. The Government is attempting to punish what the law never contemplated should be punished—the intention to fit out an expedition beyond the limits of the United States made of materials gathered within the limits of the United States. The expedition must be fitted out here; it must be fitted out upon your soil; it must be an entirety before the law takes cognizance of it. I hold that each individual has the right to go away, and that you have no power to arrest him. The intention to go beyond the limits of the United States, there to fit out and equip an expedition, is not a violation of the law. You have in this District a law punishing the intention to go beyond the limits of the District of Columbia to fight a duel; but, until you had that law, parties did go beyond the limits of the District, and did fight duels, without being amenable to your anti-dueling law. It is your last anti-dueling law on the statute-book that has taken cognizance of the intention, and punished it. So, sir, if you had a law to punish the intention to take the material from the United States to fit out an expedition beyond the limits of the Union, you might get hold of Walker—for that is all that he has done. He has gathered his material in New York, New Orleans, and Mobile, and perhaps other points; he has taken them man by man beyond the limits of the Union, and there fitted out his expedition, and gone to Nicaragua. In that, there has been no violation of law, because there is nothing in the law to punish the intention to fit out an expedition, if the expedition was fitted out beyond the Union.

I have a word to say, now, as to the conduct of these naval officers. I have as high a regard for the Navy, I think, as any other citizen; I honor its exploits in every conflict in which we have been engaged; but if anything can bring reproach, eternal disgrace, upon the Navy, it seems to me that it is this precise transaction. First, we have Commander Chatard, who lets Walker pass him; and then, seeming to have a glimmering of an idea that he had mistaken his duty, he undertakes to recover his lost ground by resorting to all the little, petty, low, dirty, mean attempts that could be invented, to insult him in his camp; evidently, by his own letter, trying to provoke Walker into a conflict, that he might have an excuse to fire upon him. Then Commodore Paulding comes up; and he, a man of ripe years, who might be supposed to know something of his duty under the law, does what all the world knows, and what I need not repeat here, and does it in the most ungracious way. He writes to the Government, admitting that he had not instructions to do what he did; but assuming that Walker and his men were pirates and outlaws, he writes such a letter as ought eternally to fix the seal of disgrace and condemnation on him. His letter, in my judgment, is a disgrace to the epaulets which he wears upon his shoulders.

While I am on this point, I may as well say what I feel and think: that it is high time our naval officers should be confined within the discharge of their duties according to law. There is too much disposition to exceed the law, by one and all of them. In my opinion, the President—and no man knows better than he how reluctantly I say so; but I will say what I think, let the consequences be to myself, or anybody else, what they may—would better have discharged his duty to the law, and to the best interests of the country, by pointedly rebuking the lawless act of Commodore Paulding, than by excusing it. Looking everywhere, I see naval officers disposed to exceed their authority. You cannot send one of them abroad to perform the slightest commission, but he gets beyond his instructions, launches into the open sea of extravagance, and entails upon you any amount of expense and trouble.

I am not going into that question; but I could point out instance after instance where this has been the case. It is high time that naval officers should be restrained within the letter of their instructions, and made to feel and know that they must obey the law. The way to make them do it, is not to follow out the advice of the President, and say that the act of Paulding was in violation of the law and then wink at it. That will but encourage a still further violation of the law. I would prefer seeing it punished—summarily and properly punished. It is one of those offenses against the laws of the country which demand punishment. The President cannot excuse it on the ground that Nicaragua does not complain. It is not for us to violate our laws when Nicaragua does not complain, and to execute them when she does complain. Our duty is to the law. If Paulding has discharged his duty according to the law, let him be applauded; and if he has not, let him be condemned.

It is no excuse, to me, to say that Nicaragua does not complain. That suggestion opens up a wide field for investigation. I might reply that Walker had been invited into that country to take part in a civil war, that the party with whom he acted had triumphed, that he was lawfully elected President of the Republic of Nicaragua, that his Government de facto had been recognized by the United States; and that, by the interference of another naval officer, he had been brought out of the country. True, it was said then that it was a matter of grace to him. How that was, I am not now going to inquire. But he was here claiming to be the rightful President of the Republic of Nicaragua. Patriotic men—not lawless and piratical men, as is now charged, but patriotic men—in the southern and southwestern States, in the western and the northern States, said: "We will join you, and go and help you to snatch back again the rights which have been lawlessly taken from you." I might go into all that, and show that Walker, the recognized de facto President of Nicaragua, was but pursuing, as he had a legal right to do, the recovery of that which had been lawlessly taken from him when he was thus arrested. But all that is unnecessary in this stage of the investigation, the present point being as to whether the President ought to say that Commodore Paulding had violated the law, and then undertake to excuse him for violating the law.

If this principle is to be carried out, the execution of the law is to depend on the outside opinion of the executors of the law. If the Executive thinks the violation of the law, in that particular instance, was right, he is to wink at it and let it go unwhipped of punishment. He is only to punish the offender when, in his judgment, the thing was wrong intrinsically. I do not understand that to be the proper obedience to law, nor a proper execution of law. If it can be shown that Paulding acted within the law, either written or unwritten, then let him be excused; but if not, then let him be condemned, whether we applaud his conduct or not. I might think it a very good thing to have some fellow killed that I thought better out of the world than in it; but suppose the assassin goes and puts the dagger in his heart; am I, as judge on the bench, to say to him, "My dear fellow, I cannot exactly say you did right in killing him, because you violated the law; but, inasmuch as I think the rascal ought to have been killed, I will let you go." That will not do. Such logic as that brings us to the end of all law.

For these and other reasons which I may take occasion to assign hereafter, I cannot indorse this message. I am exceedingly reluctant to dissent from any views expressed by the President, and especially so in the present condition of our public affairs; but I care not who is President; when doctrines are promulgated in antagonism to what I believe to be right, I will express the conviction of my own mind.

Upon this point I will do the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] a little justice. While I did not agree with him in anything that he said, I did admire his spunk in standing up and saying plump out what he thought on the Kansas question.

Mr. HOUSTON. This is a very interesting and important subject. I am anxious to understand it. I desire to have before me all the information that is necessary in order to understand it. I desire to have the vote taken at once upon the motion to print, with that view. I shall not make any remarks now, because I am not in possession of all the facts; but when the subject properly comes before the Senate for discussion, I shall give my views upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I trust the Senate will dispose now of the question of printing this message and the accompanying documents. With that view I ask that the motion for printing them be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The motion to print goes to the Committee on Printing, under the rules.

Mr. MASON. I do not understand that a motion to print the usual number of documents goes to the Committee on Printing as of course. I believe that that reference is required only when there is a motion to print extra numbers.

Mr. SEWARD. There can be no harm in the reference.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The rule provides for a Committee on Printing, "to whom shall be referred every question on the printing of documents, reports, or other matter transmitted by either of the Executive Departments, and all memorials, petitions, and accompanying documents, together with all other matter, the printing of which shall be moved, excepting"—now I call the attention of the Senate to the exceptions, for they do not embrace this case—"excepting bills originating in Congress; resolutions offered by any Senator; communications from the Legislatures, or conventions lawfully called, of the respective States; and motions to print by order of the standing committees of the Senate." In all other cases a motion to print must go to the Committee on Printing. If there be no objection, I presume the reference may be dispensed with; but if it be referred I am authorized to report at once in favor of the printing, as we are not required by the rule to submit any estimates of the cost of printing the usual number, where that only is proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided that the motion to print goes of course to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then I am authorized by the Committee on Printing to report in favor of printing this message and the accompanying documents.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the reference of the message and documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not wish to detain the Senate at this late hour of the day on this subject; and I would not, if it were not that I perceive there is a demonstration on the part of many Senators who feel a deep interest on the subject, as it is natural they should, to express their views, and make their positions known before the country. This being so, I will occupy the attention of the Senate for a very few moments in expressing mine.

This is a case in which a naval officer, acting under the command of the Government, has, on foreign waters, arrested a body of late, or present, American citizens, after they had actually landed and began to levy war against a foreign State. It is complained that that act was illegal; and it appears very plainly that we have no laws which authorize a naval officer in command in such a case to arrest fugitives, whatever might be their designs, after they have reached the coast and commenced their operations. Such an act can only be authorized by some law of this national Congress. I suppose there is no doubt about that.

The President has stated the facts in his message to be just exactly as we understand them. He announces that this officer has arrested this body of American citizens, and that the place of arrest was without the jurisdiction of the United States, and of course the transaction was without the authority of a law of the United States. He admits that; but the President proceeds to another question, and that is, whether the officer ought to be punished, by censure or otherwise, for committing the act; and upon that the President makes a case in palliation and excuse for the officer, and that is, that the party who were arrested had been indicted in the United States for organizing a band of men with the intention of proceeding to levy war against the State of Nicaragua, with which we were at peace; that, in the very act of committing this crime, or this misdemeanor, they have escaped from the vigilance of the police and got upon the high seas; that the naval officer who is to be censured is one whose duty and whose business it was to arrest that band upon the high seas before they landed; failing to do this, the naval officer arrested them in the very act of the war which they had meditated, and arrested them on land in sight of the sea, and sent them back as prisoners of war to the United States.

Here, then, are two parties who are delinquent. In the first place, there is this band of lawless men who had escaped from the vigilance of the police, and had gone abroad to levy war against a State with which we were in amity, in violation of the laws of the United States, and who had reached a place where they were without our jurisdiction, but were engaged in the very act; and here, on the other hand, is the officer who, through excess of vigilance, has surpassed his instructions, and has himself committed a violation of the laws of the United States in arresting the invading party.

It seems to me that the President has balanced this case with exact justice. He has censured the fugitives, or criminals; he designates them as a force that had gone, as marauders and as pirates, to levy war against a peaceful State. He has, at the same time, admitted that the officer who arrested them has violated the laws, and has pronounced his censure in such a marked and distinct manner that it is not to be inferred by any one that the President would sanction or approve such transactions, even although they might be harmless or beneficial, hereafter.

What more can Senators ask than this in relation to either side? Suppose that they should succeed in obtaining a censure and punishment more or less severe against this officer: how would that look? The whole police force of the United States, civil, military, and naval, were instructed to prevent this outrage against Nicaragua. The officer has prevented it, but in doing so has transgressed his instructions. The President admits just this. If he goes further, and punishes the officer, then what is he to do with the offenders that have been arrested? The offenders have been arrested, and have been brought back to be submitted to justice; but the President of the United States has altogether omitted, has neglected to do anything to bring General Walker and his men to trial for the offense for which they stand indicted; on the contrary, he has declared that they are free to go where they please; and he is even now, by this martial chieftain, defied to his teeth in letters which he publishes in the capital, announcing to the President that no matter who may interfere, or what may be the form of interposition, whether it be legal or illegal, whether it be at home or abroad, armed or unarmed, he is determined to renew prosecution of his unlawful design, and continue it to a successful end.

Now I am quite willing, if the honorable Senators shall insist upon it, to have a more severe censure bestowed upon Commodore Paulding, for the violation of the laws which he has committed; but I must ask them, in return, to measure out some punishment for these offenders whose greater crime is to go unpunished. Suppose the President of the United States should punish Commodore Paulding, leaving these offenders to go unpunished: what is the instruction we shall thus give to the country and mankind? "You may go out of the jurisdiction of the United States, and levy war against any nation with which we are at peace, provided you can only escape the vigilance of the police on land; and if you shall be arrested in the execution of the act itself by our power, after you have commenced the very act, although the State itself which is assailed shall be grateful for the protection and defense it has received from us, still, the officer who arrested you shall be punished, while you, who commit this crime against our laws, shall be rewarded and honored."

It seems to me that Senators on the other side ought to go further, and propose a feast to these recaptured fugitives; propose some reward; propose to restore General Walker to the position and place he held when arrested. Let them bring out their proposition in full. Let us see what it is. It is not enough to punish Commodore Paulding. If the crime which he has committed is so signal a one, then there must be merit on the part of those whom he has brought back here without the authority of law; and that merit ought to be recognized. Some of the Senators seem to recognize some merit in them. They say there is no law against their act; that they have violated no law. They put General Walker and his band on the footing of emigrants going to occupy peacefully, and cultivate a foreign soil.

The process of emigration and settlement, Mr. President, has been well settled on this continent for two hundred years. The only emigration that has ever been made from any part of the world to this, which has resulted in adding to the blessings of civilization without being attended by disasters which rendered it a curse instead of a blessing to the continent, has been the emigration of the agriculturist, the merchant, and the mechanic—the peaceful emigration of peaceful industry with the implements of industry. Disguise the matter as we may, while we are engaged, as the President says, in making railroads across the isthmus, while we are engaged in constructing works there which will invite peaceful emigration and produce a rapid settlement and a new civilization in Central America if we ourselves shall only preserve the peace there, and which will soon bring that country under the jurisdiction of the United States, here is a series of invasions which have been made by armed emigrants for a period now of some seven or eight or ten years, and there is not remaining, I think, in Nicaragua, across the whole extent of the isthmus, a single plantation, a single farm, a single workshop, a single press, a single church, a single school-house—in short, a single monument of any kind of American civilization. How different from the civilization of other parts of the country! On the other hand, the isthmus is blackened with the ashes and the ruins of cities founded by a race which we despise and which we propose to supersede—ruins made by our own marauding citizens.

If it is right to invade Nicaragua, which is a weak State, it is right to invade New Granada. How shall we appear before the world, on the one side, in bringing New Granada only one year ago down into the very dust to indemnify us for an assault made by a lawless mob against American citizens passing over that isthmus, and on the other, excusing or justifying the invasion of Nicaragua committed by this armed force? If it is right to invade New Granada, it is right to invade Brazil. There is hardly a nation or State south of the United States that is self-sustaining, much less one that can resist a serious invasion by the people of the United States, or by such emigrants as might arm themselves and go abroad for that purpose.

If it is right for us to invade these States, or suffer our citizens to do so, then it is right for the States which join us to invade us also. I can see no good reason why we should punish the Pawnees and Apaches for committing depredations on our outposts of civilization, and claim that our citizens may go abroad with impunity, and commit offenses of the same kind against civilized States. If it is right for us to justify or excuse these transactions, it is equally right for citizens of New York, and Ohio, and Michigan, that live on the northern frontier, to go across in armed bands to settle in Canada, first dispossessing the occupants of that country of their farms and their homes, by the sword and by fire, before they begin to apply the plow to the land. If we hold this to be right, then, if such war shall begin on their part, we shall have no cause of complaint against Great Britain when her subjects come across the St. Lawrence and the lakes, and invade and expel our peaceful inhabitants there.

And yet, sir, so different is this rule which is now sought to be established in regard to these southern countries from the principle obtained in regard to the northern waters, that, by unanimous consent of the American people, when one solitary Canadian was found on the frontier of New York who had, at a period of some six months or a year before, been engaged in an act of depredation upon the frontier, and had committed trespasses by which property was destroyed, and a single life lost, reclamation was made on the British Government to bring that offender to justice. He underwent a trial from which there was no power in the Federal Government and in the British Government that could discharge him. He would have been held, if he had been convicted, to atone with his life for the crime which he had committed. So, also, on the other hand, General Scott was sent to that frontier, and, I believe, with the unanimous consent of Congress, to prevent just such depredations as these on the part of our citizens against the citizens of Canada; and it is amongst the brightest of his honors, the greenest of the wreaths which encircle his brow, that he kept and preserved the peace between these two great and jealous nations.

The principle is precisely the same here, and I think gentlemen ought to look at the bottom of this matter. If they really think that this principle is wrong, let them introduce their bill to repeal the neutrality laws; but so long as the laws remain, let us not punish the person who, although he transcends his power in bringing the offenders to punishment, still effectually brings them to punishment, especially if, at the same time, we determine to let the offenders who are arrested go unwhipped of justice.

Mr. DAVIS. With the Senator's permission, I should like to ask a question. I do not quite understand his proposition. What principle is that which has been asserted on this side, and which is exactly equal to the principle which justified troops being put along our own border to prevent them from going out of the United States to make war on a neighboring State, and which principle he further asserts requires us to ask the repeal of the neutrality laws?

Mr. SEWARD. It is this: that the crime consists altogether in the offender being caught; that if he can escape from the United States and reach the country against which the war is to be made, then the act is innocent and right, because he is an emigrant!

Mr. DAVIS. Who said that?

Mr. SEWARD. That is the way I understand the position of both the Senators from Mississippi.

Mr. DAVIS. That is your position and nobody else's. There has been no such position taken on this side. We have contended that the law did not authorize the President to arrest people in a foreign country.

Mr. SEWARD. Allow me to remind the honorable Senator that his colleague stated that Walker was guilty of the violation of no law, and he asked us to show what law he had violated. The President shows that he violated the laws of the United States. The President goes further, and quotes a "higher law" which he says the offender violated. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I was afraid the President had got into "higher-lawism" when I found myself a little against him. [Laughter.] But, sir, my colleague took, by way of illustration, the position which he exemplified in his own person, as well as that of General Walker, that every American citizen had the right to expatriate himself, and to bear arms when he expatriated himself, and thus expatriating himself, to engage in any revolution in a foreign land. That was not the assertion that the crime consisted in being caught. It was not the assertion of a principle which made it exactly the same, whether the Government within its own limits enforced its laws, or whether it sent its Navy and Army into foreign countries, there to enforce its laws. The illustration which was made, was that of the sacred privilege of an American citizen to bear arms wherever he chooses, and to leave his own country to stake his life and fortune in any other whenever he pleases. It was on this sacred principle that the war of 1812 was fought—a principle dear to every American heart—a principle incorporated into our national history.

Mr. PUGH. With the utmost respect for the President of the United States, both as a magistrate and as an individual, I am not able to indorse the principles avowed in this message. It is not that I have any special sympathy for William Walker, nor for the enterprise in which he has been engaged; but I think the principles which have been avowed by the President in this message are neither warranted by the Constitution of the United States, nor by any statute law of the United States, nor by any principle of the law of nations.

The question is not whether William Walker was committing a crime against the Government of Nicaragua within her limits. Let her punish him, if she is able to punish him. Who made us the avenger of her wrongs? Was he committing a crime on the high seas? We know what that crime is. It is piracy, for which any nation may arrest him. That is not pretended.

Then what has he done? The Senator from New York said he made war on a foreign nation. That is no crime by any law of the United States. It is a crime to set on foot within the jurisdiction of the United States a military expedition. That is all the offense there is. To go outside of your limits and commit an act of war against any other power, is no offense by your neutrality law or by any other law. If he attacked the peaceable vessels of any other Power on the high seas and committed an act of piracy, arrest him on the high seas; but so soon as he came within the jurisdiction of another Power, the authority of the Army and Navy ceased, and the authority of the President ceased. It is no question about Commodore Paulding. I do not care whether he is punished or not. I do not want to punish any man for an error of judgment; but I agree with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, that the message is not logical. If William Walker deserved punishment at our hands, the mere fact that he was arrested within the jurisdiction of the State of Nicaragua, which does not complain of it, does not detract from the merit of Commodore Paulding, and he ought to be rewarded with a medal just as much as Commander Ingraham was, for violating the neutrality of Turkey in search of a praiseworthy object. He either did right or he did wrong. If he did right, if the occasion were as urgent as the Senator from New York says it was, then reward him; do not turn him out of the Senate of the United States and from the face of the President, with this paltry excuse.

I deal not with him, nor with William Walker. I deal with this proposition. The President says that he has a right to make the Navy of the United States a police force, to go abroad over the seas on all the face of the ocean, and wherever he finds a man who has left the United States to ask him his business, to sit in judgment upon him, and if he is not satisfied with his conduct, to send him home to report himself to the Secretary of State. That is the proposition to which I object. That is a grave question of principle. Where does the President get the power to do this through his agents? Where is the power? He has a right to arrest a pirate. Was this man a pirate? Where is his act of piracy? Did he assault anybody on the high seas? That is not pretended. But he came within the jurisdiction of another Power, and they say he committed an offense there. Let that Power punish him. They say he is a fugitive from our shores. Have you an extradition treaty with Nicaragua? If so, demand him under it. If you have none, then he is beyond your reach.

The proposition is that the end will justify the means; that you have armed the President of the United States with a power as despotic as is asserted by any monarch of Europe. Why, sir, the whole scope of our neutrality laws—and they go far enough—is that you have no right to punish anything but what is done within the jurisdiction of the United States. When a citizen chooses to expatriate himself, to go anywhere to fight, on any side of any question, he has a right to go. That is not the doctrine of a monarchical Government. Why? The Queen of Great Britain claims that the person who is born within her dominion owes her allegiance from the fact of birth; that he never can discharge himself from it; that he may go anywhere on the face of the earth, into any foreign country, and may take ever so many oaths of abjuration, but he is still a subject; and as he is still a subject, everywhere and at all times, that she, as his sovereign, and mistress, and protectress, is bound to be answerable for his conduct. Do we hold that doctrine? Do we not hold that any person born abroad may come here and abjure his allegiance? Why may we not abjure ours? Why not go outside of our own limits—go in our own rights, as American citizens, or as individuals, without any nationality? All the punishment I know of is to take the consequences.

I do not think Mr. Walker would have done much good for himself or anybody else in Central America, the way he was going on. That is not my proposition; but I deny utterly this authority of the President to employ the Navy of the United States to arrest persons upon the high seas, and ask them, "where are you going, and what is your business?" and to return them to the authority of the Secretary of State. Why, sir, what a miserable farce did it turn out to be. Was the man a criminal? He was brought home by the authority of the Navy Department up to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State had no business with him. He was turned over to the judiciary, and they had no business with him. Sir, the worst men often, in their persons, become the representatives of great principles; and I say it was a sacred principle—the right of an American citizen to expatriate himself—that was trampled upon in the person of this individual. It was violated by a high-handed act.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the Senator give way for a moment? There are several Senators who desire to speak, and I suggest that the resolution to adjourn over until Monday be reconsidered, and that we adjourn until to-morrow, and then discuss this question.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. PUGH. I will yield the floor in a moment. I have only one more suggestion to make. The President says, and the Senator from New York repeats, that we are losing our good name among the nations of the world. What good name? We have heard that long; we have been admonished continually by the gentlemen who wear gold and gilt buttons on the 4th of March, every four years, that if we will be very good children, and behave ourselves according to their notions, we shall have a sugar-plum occasionally, and be called good boys. What do we care for their opinion? Their views are not measured by the principles of our Government. They hold that we are bound to follow our citizens all over the face of the earth, and to hold them by the strong hand of allegiance, whereas we tell them that the moment they go forth from us, they cease to be amenable to us, and we cease to be answerable for them. While they preach all this to us, with very sanctimonious faces, while they tell us of the woeful iniquity of the proceedings of some of our people in Central America, they go on deliberately, in violation of the faith of treaties, in violation of the honor of nations and of individuals, to seize it for themselves. When I see them comporting themselves according to their own rule, I will be disposed to stretch the law of nations far enough to restrain any improper interference by our citizens.

But that is not the point which I proposed immediately to expose. I rose simply to deny, for one, the authority to use the Army or the Navy on the high seas, for any other purpose than the Army itself could be used on the land, in execution of the civil authority of this Government, and unless the President has a law to define some offense on the high seas, other than the crime of piracy, he has no right to arrest any American citizen.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not consider the debate at all premature. The paper, which has been well considered by the President for several days, is to be spread before the country. It is now going on the wings of lightning to the uttermost part of the Republic. I think it contains important errors, to which I wish to enter my dissent.

Within the last few days the country has been astounded with reports that General William Walker, formerly President of Nicaragua, and who held other high offices in that country under a Government acknowledged by this, a citizen of Nicaragua, and one hundred and fifty men under his command, were violently seized at Punta Arenas by an American captain, and forcibly brought to the United States, he was delivered to the marshal of New York, brought before the Secretary of State, and discharged, his men carried to a neighboring port by a ship-of-war, and cast upon the shore to shift for themselves, naked and penniless, their arms, their stores, their property seized. That is the case. We call, then, on the President of the United States to know by what authority these things have been done by an American post captain in our Navy. He does not vindicate them; he does not declare that they were legal; he dares not defend, while he ventures to palliate, this outrage to an American Senate and an American Congress. I intend to examine some of the grounds on which he has placed this palliation.

The President has assumed a convenient mode of argument to go to the country. He assumes a point which is now before the legal tribunals of his country and mine. He assumes conveniently that the neutrality laws of the United States have been violated, and that it is his business to enforce them. In the first place, this has not been made to appear; it has not been judicially determined; nor do I discover that he has offered to the Senate and the country any evidence of the assumption upon which he builds his argument. That is a question which he is not competent to determine; but I will waive this point, and allow him this convenient, though infelicitous mode of argument, and say that the neutrality laws have been violated by Walker and some of his one hundred and fifty men, though I do not know, and do not concede the fact to be so. The President assumes that on account of this violation of law, this officer had a right to arrest them upon the high seas. Thus the President assumes his right to use the Army and Navy anywhere upon this continent under our jurisdiction, or anywhere upon the high seas throughout the whole earth, and upon every island of the sea, and every part of the land if the country having jurisdiction does not object. He claims that not only on this continent, but throughout the whole world, he can use the Army and Navy of the United States at his discretion, provided the Governments having jurisdiction over those islands and over those lands do not object. I deny it. I say it is a usurpation of authority not granted by the Constitution or laws, but in derogation of both.

Sir, there is no point in regard to which the framers of our Government were more jealous than the use of the Army and Navy of the United States. For many years after the organization of your Government, the regular Army and Navy could not be used even to suppress open insurrection. By your act of 1791, the militia only could be used; but the Army and Navy were not authorized by the fathers of the Republic even to be employed in suppressing open insurrection. Then where does the President get the authority which he claims? He says it is under the eighth section of the neutrality act of 1818, but he does not deign to quote it. I say he has no jurisdiction anywhere for the enforcement of any law of the United States extra-territorially. He never can get such authority except by express law, and how far the law-making power can go on that point will be a question for consideration when he attempts to get the power from us. It is sufficient that he must expressly get the authority of law to exercise any extra-territorial jurisdiction, even for the purpose of enforcing every statute of the United States, and he never can use the Army or the Navy without express authority of law.

These things have been done in a foreign country, and the attempt is made to palliate them on the ground that Nicaragua does not complain. It is well known to the most ignorant man here, that there has been a civil war for years in Nicaragua, that Mr. Walker has been one of the contending parties, that he has been the de facto head of that Government. It would be passing strange if those who dispute his authority, and who are contending against him, should complain that the President of the United States had taken sides in this civil war for them and against their enemy. I am told there is a civil war now in Peru; two military chieftains there are contestants for the supreme power. If the President were to order another commodore like Commodore Paulding to go to Peru, catch one of the contending parties, seize his army, and carry them to some desert island, or to some portion of the United States, and cast them adrift, who supposes the opposite party would complain? It amounts to this: that he can make war by engaging in any civil disturbance which may be raging in another country; provided he so completely extinguishes one side that you cannot hear from them, and it being for the benefit of the other side they will not complain. That is to cure the violation of the law of nations, and of the Constitution of his own country! That is one of his pretexts that is defended by the Senator from New York.

The President says that the act of Paulding was illegal, and he cannot justify it; but it was a good thing. He does not conceal, in his message, that he rejoices in having vindicated one law by the violation of another, in the language of the Senator from New York. The President cannot command any popular respect; he cannot hold the proud attitude of a vindicator of the laws of the country, unless he himself obeys the laws; and in this case he must use uberrima fides. The country demands it. When Mr. Walker got beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, it was no reproach to the United States; it was no reproach to our people or our Government, that he went to a country which he claimed to be his own, as legally and as rightfully as the Senator from New York claims to be a citizen of the United States. When he got beyond our jurisdiction, he had a right to use whatever means were according to the laws of war and of nations to get possession of his country, and to be restored to what he claims to be his own rightful office. Let me take the case of Mr. Kossuth—Governor Kossuth—in regard to whom the Senate exhibited to the civilized world the remarkable spectacle of inviting him here to show himself off. Some few years since, he went through the United States begging aid and comfort—"material aid," I think, was his term—to enable him to go back and reinstate himself in the power from which he had been thrust by Russia and Austria. By whom was General Walker driven out of the presidency of Nicaragua? Was it by the people of Nicaragua? It was by a foreign invasion, aided by Commander Davis, of the United States Navy, that he was driven from power. Costa Rica invaded Nicaragua; Honduras and the other Central American States joined in the invasion; and he was thus driven out. Governor Kossuth said a foreign invasion had driven him out; and he got not only sympathy, but, I think, disgraceful sympathy, from this body. I believe the Senator from New York was one of the leading spirits in paying homage and tribute to that distinguished refugee, who was driven from his own country, as I admit, by foreign bayonets.

I say there is no law authorizing the President to make this arrest, and he can have no such authority unless you give him a right to use the Army and Navy for the purpose of engaging in the civil wars on this continent. That is where the case stands; it cannot be evaded or avoided. Senators may vaunt the distinguished Commodore Paulding, whose coarse brutality must be admitted by every human being who has read the correspondence. It shows that he is totally unfit to discharge any duty. The language which he uses shows that he is not only unworthy to be the commander of a ship, but that he is unworthy to be its cabin boy. He violates all the courtesies and decencies of official intercourse in trampling upon an individual who with his men committed miracles of valor, as he himself says. He, in a ship of war, with four hundred men, bears down upon one hundred and fifty vagabonds, runaways, murderers, and pirates, as he politely designates them.

Sir, it will not do to get rid of this question by denouncing General Walker and his men. As has been properly asked on this floor, if the President of the United States was enforcing your own laws, if he had a right to capture these men, why has he not held them amenable to the laws of the United States? Why does your aged and venerable Secretary of State say, when General Walker is brought before him, "take him away; I have nothing to do with him; do not bring him near me?" Why turn loose in one of your ports, without succor, without friends, without means, one hundred and fifty men, who are you do not know what—Americans or Nicaraguans? The Government seems to have found itself in a scrape, and it threw away. I will not say the stolen goods, but the evidence of its wrong; it dropped them at the first port, and then comes to Congress and attempts to vindicate, before the nation and the world, this outrage on our Constitution and on the law of nations, by turning round and vilifying the actors in this scene; and I believe the President attempts to mend the matter by quoting Scripture.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, there is a point in this case that has not yet been elucidated, and upon which I desire information. It is this: by our law, as I understand it, if an expedition is set on foot within the limits of the United States, it is a violation of our neutrality laws. General Walker is charged with that offense, and the men who were with him are charged to have been guilty of the very act of levying war upon another Government. I understand, without having an opportunity of looking now into the law of nations, that, by the law of nations, the United States would be held responsible for the acts of its own citizens, if they were done in pursuance of an unlawful expedition set on foot within the jurisdiction of the United States. It would be a cause of war against the United States by Nicaragua. It is the duty of the President of the United States, under the treaty of peace between the United States and Nicaragua, to see that that treaty of peace, which is the paramount law of the land, shall be executed as well as every other law of the United States. If an expedition, set on foot within our jurisdiction in violation of our laws, actually invade the territory of a country with which we are at peace, for whose acts we are to be held responsible, for whose acts Nicaragua, if she had the power, would have a right to meet us man for man and gun for gun, and carry the invasion back into the United States; I say, sir, upon my present impression, without now examining it, that it is the duty of the President of the United States to see that the treaty of peace with Nicaragua is faithfully executed; and if this marauding expedition is caught in the very act, before any great depredations have been committed, it is the duty of the President of the United States to arrest them in the act.

I will put this case: Suppose, for instance, in Great Britain an army was raised in violation of the neutrality laws of Great Britain, to invade the United States; they sail to the United States, and they are commencing an attack on the city of New York: what is the duty of Great Britain? What is the duty of the commander of her fleet? If she finds her own citizens in the very act for which we have a right to hold Great Britain responsible, and to declare war against her, what is her duty? It is to arrest her own citizens who are engaged in the commission of an act of war against us, which compromises the Government of Great Britain. So, precisely, is it here. If these men were engaged in an act against the Government of Nicaragua, which compromises the Government of the United States, the result of which may lead to war against us, the President of the United States, in the fulfillment of the treaty of peace, is bound to see that no such war is committed upon them.

Why, sir, the Government of Nicaragua have just as much right to hold us responsible for these unlawful expeditions, fitted out within the jurisdiction of the United States, as they would have if a portion of the Navy should go and commence war on Nicaragua. If one of our vessels had actually entered on a war against Nicaragua, what would be the duty of Commodore Paulding? It would be to arrest them in the act, and save his country from violating the treaty of peace. Without discussing this question now at length, for I am not prepared to go into it, as my judgment may depend on other facts besides those which now appear, I am not willing to say that I acquiesce in the statement which is made by the President, and by gentlemen here, condemning the act of Commodore Paulding as illegal. I hold this to be the true law: that if an expedition is raised within the United States for the purpose of invading a country at peace with the United States, if they actually go and make that invasion, that Government, by the law of nations, has a right to hold the United States responsible, and to make war on us for it.

Mr. PUGH. While the Senator is looking out the facts on which he says his opinion will be based, I think he had better look into that proposition a little, for I do not believe he will find any law for it at all.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter into this debate at this time. I regard it as premature. I did not hear all of the message read. I have no doubt there are other documents accompanying it by which we can see at least the instructions under which this officer acted. I regard this as a very important debate. The subject is perhaps of as much interest as any that we shall have before us during the present session; for on the one hand it cannot be disguised that the representatives of foreign countries here are watching with great interest the course we may pursue; while on the other, those who are thirsting for civil and religious liberty are watching us to see what benefit they are to have at our hands. Nor should I say one word but for some remarks which dropped from my friend from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] in relation personally to Commodore Paulding.

It may not be known to the Senate that he is directly the descendant of that man who, in the darkest period of our revolutionary history, when patriotism was on the lips, but treason festered in the hearts of some of the leading men in the country, stepped forth from the humble walks of life to render a service that will redound to his immortal honor. From the moment Commodore Paulding entered the naval service in boyhood, to the present time, he has never uttered a word or committed an act which will not redound to his honor; and I undertake to say, with the little information on the subject that I can glean from partially hearing this debate now, that the manner in which he committed this arrest, wrongful though it may be, was not ungracious; and that in no act or word, to those whom he deemed it his duty to arrest, can he be said to have acted in any ungracious manner; much less has he tarnished his epaulets, and disgraced them as my friend from Mississippi thinks. That has not been the result.

I do not pretend to palliate the act. If our naval officers be permitted to land on the shores of a foreign nation to arrest whom they please in this way, I can foresee that, in a very short time, the country may be embroiled in hostilities from which it may be difficult to extricate ourselves. I can see incalculable evils to result from such a course; and I do not pretend to palliate it, nor do I perceive how it can be squared with any rule of law. But, sir, place the responsibility where it ought to rest. You send out a naval captain to stop filibustering. Let me say I do not look upon filibustering as the worst crime in the world. I do not highly regard the law of 1818. It was wise, no doubt, in our state of weakness, but it is useless to us now. On that subject I may say something hereafter. But when you undertake to send out a naval captain, with loose instructions, to stop filibustering, and refer him generally to an act of Congress about which all your courts differ every day in the year, he interprets them as a seaman, and not as a jurist. He says: "You have sent me to stop filibustering; and the best way to do that is to catch all the filibusters and send them back to you."

Now, sir, the Administration, if I understand it, have detached Captain Chatard from his command because he did not arrest Walker in passing him. That was within the jurisdiction of Nicaragua as much as was the arrest by Paulding. He was within a marine league of the coast; he was within one mile of it; and yet, if I understand the matter, he is to be punished for not doing an act which we are condemning Paulding for having done.

I only rose to relieve Captain Paulding, knowing him personally, knowing that he is one of the brightest ornaments of the service, from the odium attempted to be cast upon him. He has erred, undoubtedly. The President does not pretend to screen him from an error in law; but I mean to say he has not erred in such a way as should, in the language of my friend from Mississippi, cast disgrace upon his epaulets. I mean to say that in no word or act to the gentlemen whom he arrested did he show the slightest want of courtesy, that has ever come to my knowledge.

Mr. BROWN. On the subject of Captain Paulding's ancestry I desire to say a word. He is said to be the son of the Paulding who took part in the arrest of André.

Mr. MALLORY. I did not say he was the son. Mr. BROWN. I have seen it stated elsewhere that he claimed to be the son. I do not know what other illustrious ancestors he may have had to which the Senator alluded.

Mr. MALLORY. He is descended from the Paulding that captured André. What relation he is I do not pretend to say.

Mr. BROWN. Whether he be a son or grandson, a nephew or grand-nephew, has, in my judgment, nothing on earth to do with this inquiry. His ancestor did well, did nobly. The question we have to inquire into now, is as to what Paulding himself has done. Has he acted within the limits of law? I understand the Senator from Florida to admit that he has not; and yet he undertakes to excuse him on the ground of his illustrious ancestry.

Mr. MALLORY. My friend will excuse me for interrupting him. In the few remarks he addressed to the Senate he said that in making the arrest Commodore Paulding had acted in a most ungracious manner, and that he had entailed disgrace on his epaulets in doing so. That he had performed the arrest in an ungracious manner, which I presumed to mean an ungentlemanly, or unhandsome, or rude manner.

Mr. BROWN. I would ask my friend from Florida whether he has carefully read the letter of Commodore Paulding to the Government, in which he charges piracy, lawlessness, buccaneering, and everything else in the whole catalogue of naval offenses against Walker and his men.

Now, sir, I have the same authority for saying that the men who were under General Walker's command had rendered distinguished services to this country, which the Senator has for saying that the ancestors of Paulding had rendered essential service. I undertake to say that there were men in that command who not only risked their lives, but shed their blood in defense of the American flag, in the late war with Mexico; and yet this man Paulding, whose highest claim seems to be that he is descended from illustrious ancestors, has the audacity, in an official communication to the Government, to charge these men with piracy, with buccaneering, with lawlessness, and with all the offenses in the whole catalogue of crimes. Upon what evidence? Where is the authority upon which these charges are based? Is there any indictment against Walker for piracy? Is there any charge against him for piracy? Does it rest upon anything else than the mere declaration of Commodore Paulding, in an official communication which has been sent to Congress by the President, thus to be incorporated into the everlasting archives of the Government, to live through all time to come?

I say that when Commodore Paulding so far forgets his duty as thus lightly to charge piracy, and buccaneering, and lawlessness, and other high offenses, against men who have distinguished themselves in the military service of the country, he does disgrace his epaulets and ought to have them torn from his shoulders. If there be any indictment against Walker or any man under his command, show it, point to the court where it is; but if there be not, upon what authority does this man Paulding dare to arraign him before the American people and the world as a pirate. I know not how far my judgment may weigh against that of the descendant of the Paulding who captured André, but whatever it is worth, I venture it here, that Walker is not only not a pirate, not a buccaneer, but that he is a man that has violated no law. Put him upon his trial before a fair jury of the country, and my life upon it he will be acquitted. He will be acquitted in Louisiana; he will be acquitted in Florida; he will be acquitted in New York; wherever he can get a fair and impartial trial according to the laws of the country, he will be set at liberty. My complaint against Paulding is, that he makes the charge without proof; and my complaint against the President is, that he sends it to the Senate and gives to it the high indorsement of the Chief Magistrate of this great nation.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] says that Walker is charged with levying war against a foreign Government. By whom is he so charged? Where is the evidence of it? Is there an indictment pending? Is there a well-established charge anywhere but by public rumor? I meet the charge by saying that Walker was but endeavoring, as others have done, to recapture his lost rights. After Louis Philippe was expelled from France, if he had undertaken to regain his throne, this Government would have had the same right to interpose and arrest him that it had to interpose and arrest Walker. Louis Philippe was driven out by violence. If he had attempted to go back to France to regain his lost privileges, no one would have pretended that the Government of the United States had a right, by military force, to arrest him; yet, for the life of me, I cannot see the difference between an arrest in that case and the one before us.

But, says the Senator from Wisconsin, Walker was a citizen of the United States. That he was a native of the United States, I grant; but did he claim the protection of your flag—did he claim to be a citizen of the United States? So far from it he was arrested under the flag of Nicaragua. If he had been arrested under the flag of the United States—under the banner of the stars and stripes—there would have been some excuse for it; the excuse might have been based on the ground that he was abusing the flag; but he was under a foreign flag, and claimed its protection. Putting himself under that flag, proclaimed to all the world that he had expatriated himself, as he had a right to do. He was not then a citizen of the United States, nor did he claim to be.

I understand that while I was temporarily absent from the Senate some time ago, the Senator from New York expressed some very erroneous views in reference to the positions I took in the few remarks which I had the honor to submit in the early part of this discussion. What I said, if not with entire distinctness, I had hoped with sufficient clearness to be understood, was, that a citizen of the United States has a right to expatriate himself, that there was no power in the executive Government to prevent his doing so, and that in leaving the country he had the right to bear arms. These propositions being true, I illustrated them in my own person by saying that I had the right to shoulder my musket and shake hands with the President, telling him I was going to Nicaragua, or any other country, to take part in a civil war, and that he had no right to molest me. I said every other citizen of the Republic had precisely the same right.

I have supposed heretofore it was one of the chief glories of this country, that our people did take part in these contests for liberty. The earliest and most brilliant efforts of "the great commoner," the illustrious Clay, were the powerful orations which he pronounced in the House of Representatives in favor of the South American States, then struggling to throw off the despotism of Spain. His speeches in defense of Grecian liberty were no less distinguished for eloquence and intensity of patriotism. What did all those speeches mean if they were not an appeal to the young and ardent patriotism of Americans to go and help to fight those battles for liberty? Who does not recollect the struggle in Texas, when the illustrious sage of the Hermitage, obeying the laws of his country forbidding the fitting-out of expeditions, issued his proclamations? He determined to enforce the law, but he never dreamed, and, with all his heroism, never dared to arrest any citizen who had armed himself with a view to go and join my venerable friend, [Mr. Houston,] then fighting the battle of liberty in Texas. Did Jackson ever dare to usurp power? I appeal to you, sir, and to Senators around me, what would have been thought of the "old usurper," as his enemies called him—Andrew Jackson—if he had dared to send a naval force to arrest Sam Houston, President of Texas, and bring him back to the United States? Would there not have been a universal burst of indignation throughout the Republic? If it might not have been done under Jackson, I want to know by what warrant the same thing is done under the rule of James Buchanan.

Mr. MALLORY. I did not rise to enter into the debate, as I before observed, and expressed no opinion on any question involved, except the remarks of my friend from Mississippi. His remarks now show that I have vindicated Commodore Paulding from his assertion that he did not make this arrest ungraciously, and that he did not, by the arrest or its manner, entail disgrace on his epaulets. I do not defend the assertions of his letter. I concede it is bad taste in any official to use epithets towards others; it will not strengthen his case. But my friend from Mississippi will recollect that there is a high example in the authority of the Commander-in-Chief of the Armies and Navies of the United States, the President himself, a few years ago.

Mr. BROWN. I beg to correct my friend. I hope I was not understood as speaking of the ungracious conduct, in that particular, of Commodore Paulding. I spoke of the ungracious conduct of Commander Chatard, who wrote insulting, taunting, insolent notes to Walker, meaning nothing but to provoke him into a conflict; but I did not, in that connection, charge like conduct on Commodore Paulding. When I came to speak of his note, or of his official communication to the Government, in which he spoke of Walker and his men as being pirates and outlaws, marauders, buccaneers, and all that, then I characterized him as having done an act, the character of which I mentioned.

Mr. MALLORY. I am glad my friend has made this explanation. I did not so understand him. He will remember but a very few years ago the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of this country, the President himself, on a similar occasion, pursued a similar course. He not only pronounced them pirates, in an official paper, but he proclaimed it to foreign nations—the most unfortunate proclamation ever sent forth by this Government. American blood flowed freely in consequence of that proclamation; and when American citizens stepped forward to shield them, the proclamation of the President of the United States denouncing them as traitors was held up as authority for their execution. I deplored it at the time; but it will be remembered that this sentiment about these expeditions is broadcast over the land, and that Commodore Paulding, in entertaining the sentiment that there was a military expedition fitted out, and that, by being fitted out, the men made themselves amenable to the laws punishing piracy, does not entertain a singular sentiment. I do not entertain it. I only shield him from the imputation of the Senator from Mississippi, as I understood it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not rise to prolong the debate, but to return the compliment which my friend from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] paid me when he said he admired my pluck in speaking my sentiments freely, without fear, when I differed from the President of the United States. He has shown his pluck, and various others have shown theirs, on the present occasion. According to the doctrine announced the other day, each Senator who has done so has read himself out of the party. I find that I am getting into good company; I have numerous associates; I am beating up recruits a little faster than General Walker is at this time. [Laughter.] I think, however, it will be found after a while that we are all in the party, intending to do our duty, expressing our opinions freely and fearlessly, without any apprehension of being excommunicated, or having any penalties inflicted on us for thinking and speaking as we choose. If my friend from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] were in his seat, I should say to him, inasmuch as he declared in his Tammany Hall letter that he was going to fill by recruits from the Republicans all the vacancies caused by desertions in the Democratic party on account of differences with the President in opinion, that he seems to have been very successful to-day in getting leading Republicans on his side, and recruiting his ranks just about as rapidly as there are desertions on this side of the House. [Laughter.] The Senator from New York, I believe, has the command of the new recruits. Well, sir, strange things occur in these days. Men rapidly find themselves in line and out of line, in the party and out of the party.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. I have an inducement on this occasion which is new and peculiarly gratifying to me, which will excuse me for being found on the side of the Administration. The message announces that, in the judgment of the President, this expedition of Mr. Walker was in violation of the laws of the land, and therefore to be condemned. So far I agree with him; but he goes further, and pronounces it to be in violation of "the higher law;" and I am sure I should be recreant to my sense of "the higher law" itself, if I did not come to his support on such an occasion. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. I perceive the consistency of the Senator from New York in the ground on which he bases his support of this message. Now, sir, so far as the President pronounces this arrest of General Walker to have been a violation of the law of the land, I concur with him. As to the allusion to "the higher law," I think that is well enough in its place, but it is not exactly appropriate in the execution of the neutrality laws of the United States. I would rather look into the statutes of the United States for the authority of the President to use the Army and Navy in enforcing the neutrality laws. By the statute of 1818 he has ample authority within the jurisdiction of the United States; and that jurisdiction is defined to extend as far as one marine league from the coast. If an arrest be made within that distance, the courts of the United States have jurisdiction, but there is no authority to arrest beyond that distance. The authority given in the eighth section of the act, to which reference is made, but which is not quoted in the message, is confined in terms to cases within the jurisdiction of the United States as defined in the act. How defined? Defined in the previous sections as being within one marine league of the coast. It thus appears that the whole extent of the President's power to use the Army and Navy under the act of 1818 is within our own waters and one marine league from the coast.

I did suppose that the President himself put that construction on his authority, for I understood him to ask for further and additional authority from Congress to enable him to put down filibustering expeditions. What further authority could he want, if the existing laws allowed him to roam over the high seas and sail around the world and go within one marine league of every nation on the earth? It might be supposed that his authority was extensive enough to employ his entire Navy; and that, certainly, he would not ask for power to invade other nations.

For these reasons I supposed that the President, on reflection and examination, had come to the conclusion that his authority was full and ample within one marine league of our coast, and ceased the moment you passed beyond that on the high seas. That has been my construction of the neutrality laws. I believe it is the fair construction. I am in favor of giving those neutrality laws a fair, faithful, and vigorous execution. I believe the laws of the land should be vigorously and faithfully executed. There may be public sentiment in certain localities unfavorable to the operation of the law, but prejudice should not be allowed to deter us from its execution. This is a Government of law. Let us stand by the laws so long as they stand upon the statute-book, and execute them faithfully, whether we like or dislike them.

Sir, I have no fancy for this system of filibustering. I believe its tendency is to defeat the very object they have in view, to wit: the extension of the area of freedom and the American flag. The President avows that his opposition to it is because it prevents him from carrying out a line of policy that would absorb Nicaragua and the countries against which these expeditions are fitted out. I do not know that I should dissent from the President in that object. I would like to see the boundaries of this Republic extended gradually and steadily, as fast as we can Americanize the countries we acquire and make their inhabitants loyal American citizens when we get them. Faster than that I would not desire to go. My opposition to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which pledged the faith of this nation never to annex Central America, or colonize it, or exercise dominion over it, was not based on the ground that I desired then to acquire the country; but inasmuch as I saw that the time might come when Nicaragua would not be too far off to be embraced within our Republic, being just half way to California, and on the main road there, I was unwilling to pledge the faith of this nation that in all time we never would do that which I believed our interest and our safety would compel us to do. I have no objection to this gradual and steady expansion as fast as we can Americanize the countries. I believe the interests of commerce, of civilization, every interest which civilized nations hold dear, would be benefited by expansion; but still I desire to see it done regularly and lawfully, and I apprehend that these expeditions have a tendency to check it. To that extent I have sympathized with the reasons which the President has assigned in his message for his opposition to them; but I desire that his opposition shall be conducted lawfully; for I am no more willing to allow him unlawfully to break them up than I am to permit them unlawfully to fit them out. I am not willing to send out naval officers with vague instructions, and set them to filibustering all over the high seas and in the ports of foreign countries under the pretext of putting down filibustering. Let us hold the Navy clearly within the law. Let the instructions that are given to our officers be clear and specific; and if they do not obey the law, cashier them, or, by other punishment, reduce them to obedience to the law.

But in this case it is a very strange fact that Captain Chatard is degraded and brought home for not arresting Walker on the identical spot where Commodore Paulding did arrest him. Paulding and Chatard are thus placed in a peculiar position. Paulding arrests him, as we are told, in violation of law. Chatard is degraded for not arresting him in violation of law. This shows that the moment we depart from the path of duty, as defined by law, we get into difficulty every step we take. All the difficulties and embarrassments connected with the conduct of Paulding and Chatard arise from the fact that in our anxiety to preserve the good opinion of other nations, by putting a stop to filibustering, we have gone beyond the authority of law. I think it will be better for us to confine ourselves to the faithful execution of the neutrality laws as they stand, and stop these expeditions, if we can, before they are fitted out. If, notwithstanding our efforts, they escape, we are not responsible for them. I do not hold that every three men that leave this country with guns upon their shoulders are necessarily fitting out a military expedition against countries with which we are at peace. Each citizen of the United States has the same right under the Constitution to expatriate himself that a man of foreign birth has to naturalize himself under our laws. When the Constitution of the United States declares that foreigners coming here may be naturalized, it recognizes the universal principle that all men have a right to expatriate themselves and become naturalized in other countries. Walker had a right, under the Constitution of the United States, to become a naturalized citizen of Nicaragua. Nicaragua had the same right to make him a citizen of that country that we have to make a German or an Irishman a citizen of this. When Walker went from California, on his first expedition to Nicaragua, and became naturalized there, he was from that moment a citizen of Nicaragua, and not a citizen of the United States. You have no more right to treat Walker as a citizen of the United States than Great Britain has to follow an Irishman to this country and claim that he is a British subject, after he has been naturalized here. You have no more right to put your hands on Walker, after his naturalization by Nicaragua, than Austria or Prussia has to follow their former subjects here and arrest them on the ground that they were once Germans. Walker is a Nicaraguan, and not an American. Since he has been President of that Republic, recognized as such, it is too late for us to deny that he is a citizen of that country, or to claim that he is an American citizen. We are not responsible for his action when he is once beyond our jurisdiction. If he violated our laws here, we can punish him; but we have no right to punish him for any violation of the laws of Nicaragua. If he invites men to join him, and they get their necks in the halter, they must not call upon us to untie the noose after they have expatriated themselves.

It is a modern doctrine that no citizen can leave our shores to engage in a foreign war. We filled the Russian regiments, during the Crimean war, with American surgeons, and only lately the Emperor of Russia has been delivering medals and acknowledgments of knighthood to these very men. We also allowed our men to go and join the Turks, the English, and the French, and fight against the Russians. American Senators were in the habit of giving to their friends letters to the Russian Minister, in order to enable them to obtain from him commissions in the Russian army during the Crimean war. Did we suppose that we were violating the neutrality laws? We knew that each person that went on that service went on his own responsibility. If he got a leg shot off he could not call upon us to protect him, or to punish the man who shot the gun. So it is with those who choose to go to Nicaragua and try their fortunes there.

I had hoped that the feverish excitement in favor of these expeditions would have ceased long ago, and that we should be enabled to acquire whatever interest we desired in Central America in a regular, lawful manner, through negotiation rather than through these expeditions. But, sir, when I am called upon to express an opinion in regard to the legality of these movements, I must say that in my judgment the arrest of Walker was an act in violation of the law of nations and unauthorized by our own neutrality laws. To this extent, like the gentlemen around me who have spoken, I dissent from the President of the United States. I do so with deep regret, with great pain. My anxiety to act with that distinguished gentleman, and conform to his recommendations as far as possible, will induce me to give the benefit of all doubts in his favor; but where my judgment is clear, like my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] I must take it upon myself to speak my own opinions, and abide the consequences.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, I had no desire to engage in this debate, which seems to me to be premature. We have not read, or heard read, in the Senate, anything except the President's message. We have not heard his instructions to Commodore Paulding, nor any of the other papers, which I presume are voluminous. I acknowledge, that not having made the necessary preparation, which is due to the Senate on an occasion like this, it would, perhaps, be more discreet in me if I were to content myself with saying nothing; but gentlemen here have presented to-night views so far different from those which I entertain that I cannot refrain from expressing, in a few words, my dissent from them.

Sir, I believe the expedition of William Walker from the port of Mobile to Nicaragua to have been a flagrant and outrageous violation of the laws of nations. I believe it to have been just as flagrant and outrageous a violation of the laws of neutrality. I believe that the President did nothing but his duty in authorizing the naval forces of the United States to prevent the carrying on of that hostile and illegal expedition against a people and State with which we were at peace. I know not how far the instructions may have gone; they may perhaps have gone a little too far. Of that I can judge when I shall have seen them. But that the President had the right to send the naval forces of the United States beyond a marine league from our shores for the purpose of arresting Walker's expedition, I have no more doubt than I have of the rights of armed ships of the United States in war to capture an enemy a thousand miles from our coast. I believe it is due to the character of the nation that such steps shall be taken as will put down these marauding expeditions. They bring on us no credit, but the very reverse, and must ever stain the character of the nation that permits them.

Under the law of nations, there are obligations due from one to the other. Every nation at peace has a right to enjoy that peace, unmolested, either by the authority of any other nation or by the unauthorized act of any of its citizens. The nation which sanctions the unauthorized acts of its citizens in waging war against another with which it is at peace, as much violates its duties as if it had authorized that expedition; and as is the obligation of the Government, so is the obligation of its citizens, and all within its jurisdiction. Such is the position laid down by the publicists and recognized for hundreds of years—certainly for more than a century. It is right, because it is founded in natural justice and in sound reason. Every nation at peace with another, has the right to enjoy the undisturbed possession of its territory and the unimpeded exercise of its jurisdiction. That nation which attempts to defeat it for either purpose, violates its rights.

Sir, this is no new doctrine. It is exactly the doctrine which was understood when we passed the neutrality act of 1818. That act created no new offenses. It defined the offenses, provided the penalty for them, and furnished the means to the Executive of preventing them. Now it is defined as clearly as anything can be defined, by the act of 1818, that when any persons shall begin, or set on foot, a military expedition against any people, State, or nation with whom we are on terms of peace, such persons shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by fine and imprisonment, as provided by the sixth section of the act. The eighth section authorizes the President to employ the land and naval forces for various purposes specified in the act, the last of which is to prevent the carrying on of such expeditions. Where is the language in the act that limits the President to interfere with such an expedition only at the point of its starting from the United States, or within the limits of a marine league? It is enough that the expedition is begun within the United States, or within that limit which can be commanded by cannon shot. If it is begun within that limit, it is unlawful, and the party is not only unlawful in beginning it but he is violating the law in carrying it on. To "carry on" is the language of the act. That does not mean to start, to begin, to get up, to concert, to conspire together for the purpose; but it means to wage. That is it, and their waging hostilities against Nicaragua was a clear violation of the act.

Mr. TOOMBS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him to state the qualifying clause "within the jurisdiction aforesaid," and that was expressed in the foregoing section as a marine league? You have omitted the qualifying clause in the section.

Mr. PEARCE. In what section is that?

Mr. TOOMBS. The eighth.

Mr. PEARCE. I will read the whole of it to make sure of it. It is:

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That in every case in which a vessel shall be fitted out and armed, or attempted to be fitted out and armed, or in which the force of any vessel of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, shall be increased or augmented, or in which any military expedition or enterprise shall be begun or set on foot, contrary to the provisions and prohibitions of this act; and in every case of the capture of a ship or vessel within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States as before defined—"

That does not refer to a case of this sort.

— "and in every case in which any process issuing out of any court of the United States shall be disobeyed or resisted by any person or persons having the custody of any vessel of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, or of any subjects or citizens of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, in every such case it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, for the purpose of taking possession of and detaining any such ship or vessel, with her prize or prizes, if any, in order to the execution of the prohibitions and penalties of this act, and to the restoring the prize or prizes in the cases in which restoration shall have been adjudged."

In all that I do not see the qualification of which the Senator has spoken.

Mr. TOOMBS. You have read it.

Mr. PEARCE. The remainder of the section is:

"And also for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States against the territories or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace."

Not within, but "from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States against the territories or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace." Those are the words of the section. I see no such qualification as the Senator states. The only qualification is that an unlawful expedition must have been set on foot within the jurisdiction of the United States; and if it is set on foot within their jurisdiction, it is just as unlawful to carry it on without the jurisdiction of the United States as to begin it within that jurisdiction. I do not know how far the President might not go under that power. I admit, it is a very great discretion—a very large, and, if you choose, a dangerous power, which may be abused; but in a case like this, you must give a discretion to the President, or you cannot enforce your act. When the right or duty to suppress a hostile expedition against a State or people, with whom we are at peace, has arisen by the setting it on foot within the jurisdiction of the United States, it is not limited, either by anything in sound reason, or by any limitation in the act of 1818, to proceedings within the ordinary jurisdiction of the United States. I see nothing to restrain the President from acting without the ordinary bounds of our jurisdiction, or from carrying his repressive measures to any point, so that he shall infringe no rightful jurisdiction of any other State or people.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether it is not the general, and, with one exception, the universal law, that the limit of the jurisdiction is that which he assigns, and that for the very reason he gives—a marine league being taken as the extent of cannon shot; but, in order that the revenue laws of the United States might be executed, we had specially to provide that within twelve miles of the coast, an arrest for violation of the revenue laws might be made; thus further indicating the fact that we recognized the marine league as the extent of our jurisdiction in all other cases?

Mr. PEARCE. There were special reasons, I apprehend, for that provision in regard to the revenue laws. I can very easily perceive there were special reasons which do not apply to a case like this. This is a case of great exigency. The laws of nations require us to punish and suppress all these offenses. How are we to suppress them, if we are to be confined to the one league?

In the case of this very expedition, some gentleman, I think, has doubted whether it was a military expedition, and he has asked for the proof. Are we blind, that we do not see the proof? Does not everybody know that this affair was concerted at Mobile, that a steamer was cleared in a manner which indicated lawful proceedings, that after she proceeded down the bay, she was met by another steamer, which put on board men and arms? Do we not know, from letters published from members of that expedition, that they were organized and drilled as soon as they got out to sea? Does not everybody know, and does not the fact stare us in the face, that as soon as they reached Nicaragua, having passed by the port of San Juan de Nicaragua, and the mouth of that river, going some twenty miles below, a portion of these men were dispatched by William Walker to attack the fort of Castillo? Do we not likewise know that the moment he landed on Punta Arenas he proceeded to perfect his military organization there, and establish a camp styled by him the "headquarters of the army of Nicaragua?" Can anybody doubt that this was a military expedition, and, therefore, an unlawful one? The very first act he does on reaching Nicaragua is not an act of peace, is not a settlement of persons, expatriating themselves for peaceful purposes. It is hostile on its face and all around. This whole expedition was bristling with military weapons. He assumes the style of General Walker, instantly.

Does it make any difference—it does in the opinion of one of the gentlemen from Mississippi—that he had been President of that Republic? Sir, I do not care whether he had been forty times President of that Republic, and President de jure, as well as de facto; he had no right, after ceasing to be President of that Republic, after his power had been put down by a revolution as legitimate as that which set him up, to come to the United States and get up another expedition here against that country. He professes, indeed, only to seek to recover, what he, in my judgment, strangely enough, calls his lost rights. His rights were those of a conqueror, of a successful military adventurer, and nothing else. They were his when he had power to hold them; but the moment he had not the power to hold them, they were gone to the winds of heaven.

Mr. BROWN. My friend from Maryland seems to assume the whole matter in controversy, that Walker came to the United States to set up an expedition. That I deny. I deny that he set up any expedition within the limits of the United States; and if there be proof of it, I call for the proof from those who charge the fact. What I admit is, that Walker came here, complained, as any foreigner had a right to do—as Kossuth did, and as other men have done—of their wrongs, and that those who sympathized with him, as they had the right to do, joined his standard and went beyond the limits of the United States, without getting out an expedition, each man acting upon his own responsibility, and each one avoiding for himself any infraction of the law. If there was an expedition fitted out in the United States, I admit there was a violation of the laws; but if my friend from Maryland charges it, I ask for the proof—not that I would demand any proof of any charge of his; but, technically, I ask on what ground he bases the charge?

Mr. PEARCE. Why, sir, the proof is patent. Everybody knows that he went on a steamer with men and guns, and when they landed the first thing they did was to commit acts of hostility with organized troops. Surely, I shall be asked, after a while, to prove that the gas is burning above us. It is patent. It does not require any proof. We cannot listen to the narrative given by anybody, whether connected with the expedition or otherwise, without understanding that this was an organized military expedition.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 12, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 15.

I will not deny the right of expatriation, though I must say that I believe that it is not entirely settled as a legal question. I will not deny that a man may not start out with his own musket on his shoulder. I do not believe that is setting on foot an expedition. If there is any nation on the face of the earth that cannot defend itself against a man with a musket on his shoulder, the sooner it is taken possession of the better; but this is not that case; and this is not the case of two hundred men, each starting out on his own hook. We knew by the reports which preceded the sailing of this vessel, that an expedition was being organized. I take it that there are plenty of gentlemen who know that funds have been furnished to General Walker, and that stock is held by persons who advanced those funds. It is not only a hostile expedition, but a sort of commercial speculation to boot; at least I have so heard.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] just now said something about Kossuth. How can we compare the idle and rapid gasconading of Kossuth, the rhodomontade which he preached wherever he went over this country, and his idle and unsuccessful attempts to gather the "material aid" he wanted for the reconquest of Hungary, with a case like this. There was no military expedition set on foot here by him. If one had been set on foot by him, my word for it, he would have been nabbed, and subjected to the penalties of the law of 1818.

The question has been asked why it was that General Jackson did not interfere in the case of Texas. Sir, General Jackson did interfere, and there are many gentlemen here who know it, and who remember the proclamation which he issued when companies were formed for the purpose of marching to Texas. He very properly did not interfere when persons went off by themselves, and really went on their own individual enterprise; but the instant there was any concert or combination he did interfere; he published his proclamation; and I know well the effect it had in some quarters to deter people from joining military expeditions. There were companies got up in Baltimore, and one did slip off in spite of his proclamation; but nobody could doubt the honesty and good faith of General Jackson in publishing that proclamation. He meant what he said; he meant that concerted expeditions for military purposes were unlawful. Nobody can doubt that. I will not restrain the liberty of expatriation or of private enterprise; but it is this concerted military movement which I say is against the law of the land; and it is that of which General William Walker has been guilty.

The Senator from Illinois, I think, said something about the surgeons who went from this country to Russia, and he seems to liken them to this case. Those were really individual cases of private enterprise. A single gentleman of the United States, a doctor of medicine, thinks proper to go abroad to offer his services to the Emperor of Russia as a surgeon in his army. That is not concerting or setting on foot a military enterprise. If there had been any expedition concerted; if there had been two hundred men banded together here, within the knowledge of the Executive, to proceed from this country to Sebastopol, to assist in the defense of that place, this Government could not, consistently with its declared principles and its avowed acts, have refused to suppress it, and indict them for doing that which was unlawful.

What did we do during that very crisis to which the Senator from Illinois, I think rather unfortunately, referred? There was another Power engaged in that controversy which undertook to circumvent this very neutrality act about which we are talking, to invent contrivances by which they might get able-bodied military men to go from this country to assist them in that war. Everybody knows the Power to whom I allude—

England. What was the consequence? You had a controversy with that Government; its Minister was dismissed—a very unusual thing; one calculated, under many circumstances, to give offense, and produce national disagreement and quarrel. Men employed, as was believed by the British Minister, were tried by our courts; the trials were prosecuted vigorously, and one person at least, Hertz I believe, was convicted. We dismissed several British consuls. We would not allow Great Britain even to contrive any indirect mode by which she should obtain men in this country for the purpose of carrying on her war against Russia in the Crimea.

Well, sir, shall we not grant to poor, weak Nicaragua the same measure of justice which we exact of haughty England? What reason is there why we should make war upon the one Power; why we should take offense with the strong and mighty English nation, and indict her officers, her employes, and her agents, for violating our neutrality laws, and yet turn a deaf ear to the complaints of Nicaragua when she points us to bodies of men, armed and equipped, within our limits, and starting in steamboats from one of our ports, organizing their men on board those vessels as soon as they got out of sight of land, proceeding directly to their peaceful territory—that territory which, at least, should have been peaceful as far as we could make it so—and immediately commencing the hostilities which were the original object of their concerted action here?

Sir, I say it is as clear a case as ever the sun of heaven shone upon. I know not whether the instructions of the President have been transcended or not. I do say, however, that I thank him sincerely for having exerted his power to the utmost within lawful limits; and if he has transcended, and if Captain Paulding has transcended, the authority of the Government, I will be to that fault a little blind. I know it has been said of old that we applaud the treason while we hate the traitor. I take the converse, and I say I may condemn a transaction, or I may admit the illegality of a transaction, while I applaud the spirit with which it was conducted, and the motive which prompted it. I will not trouble the Senate more, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not propose to continue the discussion of this subject. I expressed the dissent which I was compelled to feel to the opinion of the President, as to the power which was exercised. I have made no war on the neutrality law, and I do not see that those who agree with me have. I have not attempted to defend any one in the organization of expeditions within the United States to make war upon a foreign country; and I believe, that no one who agrees with me has done so.

Mr. PEARCE. Though I do not agree with him in opinion, it was not the views of the Senator from Mississippi I was combating.

Mr. DAVIS. I am very glad to know it was not, because I have so much respect for the Senator from Maryland that I would regret to find him combating my positions on this question. I now pass to the purpose for which I rose, to protest against being mustered in, by the Senator from Illinois, among the recruits which he is enlisting, and in which he says he is more successful than Mr. Walker. Now, sir, I have not received bounty, and I object to being mustered in. [Laughter.] If the Senator, like the heir-expectant to an ancient throne, has established himself in a cave of Abdallah, and intends to welcome there all the disaffected, I am not in a condition to take refuge; and hope, unlike another cave, that the entrance to his asylum may show returning tracks, to account for many who may go in.

The Senator from Illinois argues as though every one who expresses a dissent from any opinion of the President of the United States had thrown himself outside of the Democratic party. Sir, we have heard more about party discipline than exactly agrees with my feelings. My relations to the party are those of a common opinion and unity of principle. My opinions are my own. Nobody can take them from me, and therefore nobody can determine whether I am inside or outside of the organization that belongs to those opinions and principles.

This doctrine of reading people out of the party is new to me. A venerable friend of mine, who used to sit in that chair, and who is here no longer—I give offense to no one I feel, when I say, to the injury of the country he is no longer here—used to talk of "old fogies." These new and unwelcome doctrines seem to suggest to me that I have become an old fogy. [Laughter.] Whence sprang this power to issue an excommunicating bull—to pronounce who is in and who is outside of the party? I thought our party's door was broad and square, always open for any one to come in, or go out, whenever he pleased. But when any gentleman chooses, in going out, to raise his standard, and call for recruits to join him in war on an Administration with which we are at peace, that is a violation of the neutrality law—an establishment of recruiting rendezvous to which I must object as an enlistment for a foreign service, and then come in aid of the Administration.

There is one point upon which I think it proper to make a single remark. Objection has been made to the President's suggesting to Congress the propriety of a modification of the neutrality law. I consider the law inefficient against our weak neighbors. It was designed to prevent military expeditions, such as could not secretly or unobserved leave our shores: it does not suffice to restrain such parties as may, though having all the semblance of peaceful emigrants, yet go forth and invade a defenseless State, or a few marauders, who may cross a mere geographical line to disturb the peace of a neighbor. Thus, in the case of Great Britain, during the period of what was called the "Patriot war," we had a special enactment to enable us to preserve the peace on that frontier—a law which terminated within two or three years, and the like of which might, with the proper modifications, be enacted now for the protection of the peace of these weak Central American States.

So far from censuring, I am inclined to applaud the suggestion that the law should be revised, and so far as the act of 1818 will not enable us to perform all our obligations to these weak American States, that we should modify it to that end. I think it should be the policy of the United States to strengthen our relations with the weaker Governments upon the American continent; that we should attempt to exercise the control of a directing hand as an elder brother, steadying the step of a younger. In order to extend our influence over these American States, we must not only discharge our national obligations, but make them feel that we extend the hand of protection over them, and, as far as is consistent with the theory of our Government, prevent our citizens from committing any violence upon them.

Mr. STUART. The questions that are involved in this message which has been sent to us by the President, certainly are very important. They relate to the proper construction and exposition of our own laws and our treaties, as well as the law of nations. It seems to me that it would be wise at this time to refer the subject, agreeably to the motion that has been made, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, that we may have a full report of the facts; that all the documents may be printed and brought before us, so that at a future day this subject may be fairly disposed of; and if the Senate are disposed to vote on the reference now, I shall not make the motion which I intend to make, which is to adjourn; otherwise, I shall insist on the motion to adjourn.

Several SENATORS. We had better adjourn.
Mr. STUART. Then I will make that motion.
The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned to Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 7, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. B. F. BITTINGER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SELECT COMMITTEE, ETC.

The SPEAKER announced Messrs. BURNETT, MORRIS of Illinois, MORRILL, FAULKNER, and PETTIT, as the select committee, under the resolution of Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, in reference to the sale of the Fort Snelling reservation; Mr. CRAWFORD to fill the vacancy in the Committee of Ways and Means, occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Banks; and Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, to fill the place on the Committee of Claims, vacated by Mr. GIDDINGS, who was excused from further service on that committee by the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled, "An act to detach Selma, in the State of Alabama, from the collection district of New Orleans, and to make it a port of delivery within the collection district of Mobile," in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

SAFETY OF PASSENGERS ON STEAMBOATS.

The SPEAKER announced, as the regular order of business, the motion to lay upon the table the motion made yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], to reconsider the vote by which the further consideration of the bill for the protection of passengers on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, was postponed to the first Tuesday in February.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will withdraw, by consent of the House, my motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was postponed to the first Tuesday of February, for the purpose of moving its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and I will say this to the House, as the reason which induces me to do so: this bill, when it comes up, may prove to be a good bill, and unobjectionable; or it may not be; but it is of such a character, however, as requires investigation, and requires time to understand its various provisions, and the House will consume time before they act upon it. The bill, therefore, when it comes up, either upon the motion to reconsider or when the first Tuesday of February arrives, comes up in the morning hour, and consumes the entire morning hour until it is disposed of, so that every committee of the House, and every member of the House who, as a member of a committee, may desire to make a report to the House, is precluded from doing so until the business now put upon the morning hour—and that clogs up the business of the morning hour—is disposed of. I think that is unfair upon other legislation. I do not charge the gentleman with endeavoring to do anything unfair; yet, so far as all other members are concerned, and so far as all other business is concerned, it acts unfairly, and must do so. I think the motion ought to be reconsidered now, and that the bill ought to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The Calendar in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is now a very short one, and there cannot be much delay or difficulty in progressing down the Calendar, at any time, far enough to reach this bill. This bill being entitled to no advantage over other business, I think it ought to take its luck with other business, and be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the morning hour be left free and untrammelled, so that the committees of this House may report, and members be able to bring their business before the House for action, as their turns may come.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I only desire to detain the House one moment, to make a statement in reference to this bill. I think there is not a member of this House who will not admit the necessity of some legislation in regard to the better security of the lives of passengers on board of steamboats. I think what we have seen the last few months admonishes us all that there is something still further required at our hands for the protection of human life on board of steamboats.

The bill which I was ordered to report, and which I did report yesterday morning by the direction of the Committee on Commerce, is the same bill which was perfected with a great deal of care, labor, and attention by both Houses of Congress during the last Congress; and it only fell through for the want of time and by continued postponements. It has been introduced this year, at this session of Congress; and the object of the committee is to have as early action as is practicable. When I reported it, I was ordered by the committee to ask that its further consideration be postponed to a future time, when it will be certain to come up. In the mean time the bill would be printed, so that members of the House would be enabled to examine it, and to suggest any amendment they thought proper.

One word in relation to the object I had in view, that the House may understand the motive I had in moving to reconsider the vote. The bill was postponed until the first Tuesday of February, and it would come up at that time if nothing intervened to prevent it; but if, for instance, there should be no session of the House on that day, or some question of higher privilege should intervene, the bill would go to the Speaker's table, where it could be reached only by a two-third vote; and I made this motion to reconsider, not for the purpose of taking any advantage of this House, not for the purpose of bringing it up before every member of the House had an opportunity to examine the bill; but merely to prevent its going upon the Speaker's table, where it would be measurably out of the control of the House. I am not particular about the reconsideration of this vote. I am not particular about this vote standing over. All that I want is, that this bill, so important to the country, this bill in which so much interest is taken, which is so much demanded, should be in such a situation that the House can act upon it.

The gentleman from Alabama makes the old-fashioned appeal here, which we who have been here some time fully appreciate, to send this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Now, no man knows better than the gentleman from Alabama, that this sending a bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is consigning it "to the tomb of the Capulets."

Mr. HOUSTON. This cry of the gentleman from Illinois is familiar to me and to members who have been here any length of time. But the difference between that gentleman's course heretofore and his course now is, that then the cry was raised towards the close of a session of Congress, while now he commences calling it the tomb of the Capulets during the first weeks of the session, and before we have had time enough to commit to the Committee of the Whole bills enough to clog it up, so as to prevent reaching his bill. I say that if his bill is one that can command the support of a majority of the votes of members of this House, there is not the least difficulty in going down the Calendar so as to reach it, and reach it at any time, and without the least possible trouble. So that the argument, while it may suit, and I may hear it with more favor from him when the session is coming to a close, is one which I cannot consent to hear now, when there is comparatively nothing upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That, sir, is a continuation of the same old song. I have heard it said before that we can pass over the other bills on the Calendar and get at any particular bill. That, we all know, is impracticable. Why, sir, this bill is No. 45; and there is not a member here, who is familiar with the transaction of business in the House, who does not know that we can never get at it in the regular order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. We all know that.

I do not wish, however, to detain the House in reference to this matter. I have no particular feeling on the subject. I only desire that this bill, which is, as I have said, of such vast importance, may be kept within the control of the House; and I think we may be able to consider it on the first Tuesday in February, to which day it has been postponed.

One word more, in reply to the gentleman from Alabama. He spoke of blocking up the morning hour, and depriving other committees of the privilege of making reports. I would remind the honorable member of the amendment which has been made in the rules of the House, which provides that the morning hour shall not be occupied for more than two consecutive days by any committee. Hence this bill only may be able to occupy the morning hour on two days; and I believe it can be disposed of in less than that time. I move, sir, to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask the Chair a question?

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the Chair and the gentleman whether this bill, coming up during the morning hour would not have to be considered during the morning hour as the unfinished business, until disposed of?

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURN's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

EIGHTH OF JANUARY.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. To-morrow being the 8th of January, I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

Mr. MORGAN. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to amend the motion, so as to provide that the House shall meet on Monday. Saturday legislation is mischievous, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays for the present, and ask for a division.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FLORENCE and MORGAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 62.

Mr. REILLY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Caskie, Chapman, John B. So the amendment was agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. MORGAN stated that his colleague, Mr. PARKER, had been detained from the House for several days by the severe illness of his wife.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, as amended.

The House divided on the motion; and there were—ayes 98, noes 68.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it does not come under the Jesuit's rule of a reasonable doubt, if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] votes on one side, against the adjournment, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] on the other, in favor of it? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billinghurst, Blair, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Stewart, William Stewart, George Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippie, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Watkins—84.

So it was ordered that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Pending the call of the roll—

Mr. PHILLIPS stated that his colleague, Mr. DIMMICK, was detained from the House by indisposition.

Mr. LETCHER, when his name was called, said: Will it be in order to remove the difficulty my friend from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] is laboring under?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I vote "ay."

Mr. KEITT stated that his colleague, Mr. BONHAM, had been for some time, and was yet, too unwell to attend the sessions of the House.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole, I wish, with the consent of my colleagues on the Committee of Ways and Means, to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is informed that the chair is unoccupied.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's message, the pending question being on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] to amend the third resolution submitted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] to refer the message to the appropriate standing committees of the House, upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield me the floor to make the motion that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate upon the resolutions before them.

Mr. THAYER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask for tellers upon the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and HAWKINS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 84, nays 93.

So the motion was disagreed to.

THE NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to offer an amendment to the resolution which is now before the committee, for the purpose of widening the proposed investigation. I do not propose to discuss at all the topics which the committee has been considering during the past three days. I am not here to consider whether

Mr. Walker was legally or illegally arrested, or whether Commodore Paulding is to be censured or applauded for his action. I have no sympathy with the course pursued by the President. I have no intention to discuss his position in relation to this matter, neither is it my purpose to enter the lists with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD,] who discussed the heroism of Mr. Walker, who, claiming to be the President of Nicaragua, submitted without a protest and without a blow to a power upon his own soil, which he claimed to be an invading force. If there is any heroism in this, I am not here to discuss that question.

I thrust aside, for the present, all questions of legal technicality in this matter; all the mysteries of the construction of the neutrality laws; all these questions which have engrossed the attention of the House during the last three days, and concerning which everybody has been speaking and nobody caring; and I come to that great paramount, transcendent question, about which everybody is caring and nobody is speaking: "How shall we Americanize Central America?"

It may be a matter of surprise that I pass over two or three questions which, in their natural order, seem to be antecedent to this one. And these questions are, first, Do we wish to Americanize Central America? Secondly, Can we Americanize Central America? Thirdly, Shall we Americanize Central America?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say that whoever has studied the history of this country, and whoever knows the character of this people, and whoever can infer their destiny from their character and their history, knows that these three preliminary questions are already answered by the American people—that we do wish to Americanize Central America; that we can Americanize Central America; and that we shall Americanize Central America.

And now, Mr. Chairman, in relation to the manner and the agency. How can we Americanize Central America? Shall we do it legally and fairly, or illegally and unfairly? Shall we do it by conferring a benefit on the people of Central America, or shall we do it by conquest, by robbery, and violence? Shall we do it without abandoning national laws, and without violating our treaty stipulations? Shall we do it in accordance with the law of nations and the laws of the United States; or shall we do it by force, blood, and fire?

Now, Mr. Chairman, my position is this: that we will do it legally; that we will do it in accordance with the highest laws, human and Divine. By what agency shall this be accomplished?

By the way, sir, I did agree with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HASKIN,] who told us yesterday that he was not in favor of petty larceny; but I did not agree with him when he said that he was in favor of grand larceny. I regret that a Representative of the people of the United States in the Council Hall of the nation should say to his constituents, to the nation, and the world, that he and the Democratic party were "rather in favor of grand larceny." Larceny is larceny; and you cannot say a meaner thing about it than to call it by its own name. I am pained that this report has gone forth that any party, or that any individual in this House, or connected with this Government, is in favor of grand larceny or petty larceny. Larceny, grand or petty, is not only disgraceful, but is absolutely and utterly contemptible. We do not go for the acquisition or the Americanization of territory by larceny of any kind whatever, but fairly, openly, and honorably.

Then, sir, by what agency may we thus Americanize Central America? I reply to the question, by the power of organized emigration. That is abundantly able to give us Central America as soon as we want it. We could have Americanized Central America half a dozen times by this power within the last three years if there had been no danger or apprehension of meddling or vexatious executive interference. But if we are to use this mighty power of organized emigration, we want a different kind of neutrality laws from those which we now have; and, therefore, I am desirous that this committee shall recommend something which shall not subject us to the misconception of the President of the United States or to his construction at all. I want these neutrality laws so plain that every man may know whether he is in the right or in the wrong, whether he is violating those laws or is not violating them. For, Mr. Chairman, with our new-fashioned kind of emigration, with our organized emigration, which goes in colonies, and, therefore, must of necessity to some extent resemble a military organization, there is great danger that a President with a dim intellect may make a mistake, and subject to harassing and vexatious delays, and sometimes to loss and injury, a peaceful, quiet colony going out to settle in a neighboring State.

Mr. Chairman, I can illustrate this position. You, sir, remember that in the year 1856, when it was bad traveling across the State of Missouri, on the way to Kansas, that our colonies went through the State of Iowa, and through the Territory of Nebraska. These were peaceful, quiet colonies, going to settle in the Territory of Kansas, by that long and wearisome journey, because it was bad traveling through the State of Missouri.

You remember that one of these colonies of organized emigrants, which went from Maine and Massachusetts, and from various other northern States, was arrested just as it was passing over the southern boundary of the Territory of Nebraska, on its way to its future home in Kansas. It was a peaceful, quiet colony, going out with its emigrant wagons all in a row, and therefore looking something like a military organization—going out with their women and their children, with subsoil plows with coulters a yard long, [laughter], with pick-axes, with crowbars, with shovels, and with garden seeds. This beautiful colony was arrested by the officials of the present Executive's predecessor. It was by some mistake, no doubt. Perhaps he took the turnip-seed for powder; and I doubt whether the case would have been better if the President had been there himself. This colony was arrested within our own dominion. It was not an emigration to a foreign country, and there was no danger of interference with the neutrality laws. These quiet, peaceful colonists, because their wagons went in a row, for mutual defense through the wild uncultivated Territory of Nebraska, where there were Indians, they were arrested as a military organization. We do not want hereafter, either within the limits of the United States or without them, any such meddling and vexatious interference by the executive power of this Government. Therefore, I say, let us have some neutrality laws that can be understood. If there had been no apprehensions in the North about the neutrality laws, if we had not expected that whatever emigration we might have fitted out for Central America would have been arrested within the marine league of the harbor of Boston, why we would have colonized Central America a dozen years ago, and had it ready for admission into the Union before this time. We want a modification or an elucidation of the neutrality laws, and I trust that it will be the duty of the committee so to report.

Before I proceed to consider the power and benefits of this system of organized emigration, and the reason why it ought not to be rejected by this House, I will proceed, as briefly as I can, to show the interests which the northern portion of this country has in Americanizing Central America, as contrasted with the interests which the southern portion has in doing the same thing. I come, then, to speak of the immense interests which the northern States have in this proposed enterprise. I am astonished that so far in this debate the advocates for Americanizing Central America seem to be mostly from those States which border on the Gulf of Mexico. As yet, I have heard no man from the northern States advocating the same thing. Let us look at the interests of the northern States in this question, and then at those of the southern States.

These northern States are, as the States of northern Europe were designated by Tacitus, officina gentium, "the manufactory of nations." We can make one State a year. In the last three years we have colonized almost wholly the Territory of Kansas. We have furnished settlers to Minnesota and Nebraska, and the Lord knows where, and we have not exhausted one half of our natural increase. We have received accessions to our numbers in that time, from foreign countries, of more than one million souls, and now we have no relief; we are worse off to-day than we were when we began to colonize Kansas. We must have an outlet somewhere for our surplus population. [Laughter.]

Sir, I have a resolution in my pocket, which I have been carrying about for days, waiting patiently for an opportunity to present it in this House, instructing the Committee on Territories to report a bill organizing and opening for settlement the Indian territory. Mr. Chairman, I came to this conclusion with reluctance, that we must have the Indian territory. But necessity knows no law. We must go somewhere. Something must be opened to the descendants of the Pilgrims. [Laughter.] Why, sir, just look at it. We are cramped in between the Atlantic ocean and the Rocky Mountains! The bounding billows of the western tide of our emigration are dashing fiercely against the base of the Rocky Mountains.

We come now to the obstruction of the great natural barrier. Nothing is more natural than that this tide should flow back. Will it flow over towards Canada? Not at all. It has already begun to flow over the "Old Dominion," [laughter,] and into other States. Missouri is almost inundated with it. We cannot check this tide of flowing emigration. You might as well try to shut out by curtains the light of the aurora borealis. No such thing can be accomplished. This progress must be onward, and we must have territory. We must have territory; and I think it most opportune that the proposition seems to be before the country to Americanize Central America. A better time could not be; for, in addition to the population which we now have, which is immense in the northern States, as I shall show you as I proceed, this financial pressure in the East, and in the different nations of Europe, will send to our shores in the year 1858 not less than half a million of men. In addition to that, we have two hundred and fifty thousand of our population who will change localities in that time. Then, sir, there are seven hundred and fifty thousand men to be prepared for, somewhere in the year 1858—men enough, sir, to make eight States, if we only had Territories in which to put them, and if we only use them economically, [laughter,] as we are sure to do by this system of organized emigration.

Now could anything be more opportune at this time, than to have this project submitted to us, of opening Central America to settlement? I assure you, if the committee will report any bill which will enable the people of the North, without larceny of any kind, without tyranny of any kind, to settle that country, I will postpone my resolution for the opening of the Indian territory, at least until the next session of Congress.

But it is not only for the purpose of furnishing an outlet for our immense population in the North that I now advocate the Americanizing of Central America. The interests of commerce, as well as this great argument of necessity, are on our side. Who has the trade beyond Central America? We have whale fisheries in the Northern ocean which build up great cities upon the eastern shore of Massachusetts. We have trade with Oregon and California, with the Sandwich Islands, and the western coast of South America. We are opening a trade, destined to be an immense trade, with the Empires of China and Japan, and we must of necessity have in Central America certain factors and certain commercial agencies, who, in a very few years, with their families and relatives, will make a dense population in Central America. I say, then, that for the interests of commerce we want Central America Americanized. This commercial interest is, unfortunately, a sectional interest in these States. It is emphatically a northern interest; and, therefore, as a northern man, I advocate especially that Central America should be Americanized.

Now, sir, I said I was astonished that gentlemen who come from States bordering upon the Gulf had advocated this project, and not the Representatives who come from northern States. Let us see the reasons why the North should be more zealous than the South in this movement. In the State of Massachusetts we have one hundred and twenty-seven people to a square mile, by the census of 1850. In the State of Rhode Island we have one hundred and twelve to the square mile, by the same census. In the State of Connecticut we have seventy-nine. In the State of New York we have sixty-five. So, you see, it was not fiction, it was not poetry, not a stretch of the imagination, when I told you that the descendants of the Pilgrims were in a tight place. [Laughter.]

But how is it with the States which border upon the Gulf? Look at it and see. They have, some of them, eighty-nine hundredths of a man to the square mile. [Laughter.] In another one we have one and the forty-eight hundredth part of a man to the square mile; and, taking them altogether, we have just about three men to the square mile in all those States which border upon the Gulf of Mexico.

Now, sir, it would be folly for me to argue, and there is no kind of reason for supposing, that these States expect to do anything about colonizing Central America. They cannot afford to lose a man. They had better give away $2,000 than to lose a single honest, industrious citizen. They cannot afford it. I have left out of this calculation, to be sure, the enumeration of the slaves in those States, for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] informed us that the question of slavery did not come into this argument properly, and I agree with him there. I think he may agree with me, that by no possibility can slavery ever be established in Central America. That is my belief. Just fix your neutrality laws, and we will fill up Central America before 1860 sufficiently to be comfortable.

Mr. MAYNARD. With the permission of the gentleman, I desire to ask him whether he will pledge himself for his constituents and for all those he represents, that when they get down there they will not make slaves of the people they find there?

Mr. THAYER. I will speak to that question. Certainly I will do it; and I will say more on that subject hereafter. I will say to the gentlemen upon the other side who have advocated this right of emigration and have no personal interest in this matter, that they can have no pecuniary interest in it, and that they have no men to spare for this enterprise. And especially do I honor the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] who professed to be moved by arguments of philanthropy in relation to this question, and who maintained that the people of Central America were oppressed, that they needed our assistance, and that it was conferring a benefit upon them to send out colonies among them to aid them to get rid of their oppressors. I am glad that that gentleman is defending the rights of emigration. No man prizes those rights more highly than I do. I think that I understand their power and their value, and I am glad to welcome among the list of political regenerators the gentleman from Mississippi with such large, wide, and noble views upon this question. I do not here indorse his whole speech. I did not hear the whole of it. I do not know what he said about Mr. Walker, whether he defends him, or whether he does not. For myself, I do not say that I defend him, or that I do not, at this time. I wait for the report of our committee, to know what are the facts in this case, and whether he is fit to be defended or not.

Now, sir, I am rejoiced that I have found aid and comfort in a great political missionary movement from a quarter where I least expected it. This argument of philanthropy is sufficiently potent with the South; while I will not deny that that argument is always, more or less, potent with the North, perhaps not so potent with the North as with the South—very likely we are more material and less spiritual—but still, I say it has some power at the North. We do not live so near the sun as do those gentlemen who border on the Gulf; but we live near enough to the sun to have some warmth in our hearts, and the appeals of philanthropy to us are not made in vain.

But, in addition to that, just look at it, sir! In addition to that great argument of philanthropy, we have not only the argument of necessity, but the argument of making money; and when you take those three arguments and combine them, you make a great motive power, which is sufficient, in ordinary cases, to move northern men, though they are not very mobile nor very fickle.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the comparison of interests between the northern and southern people of these United States in relation to the Americanizing of Central America.

I come now to discuss, briefly, the power and benefits of this new mode of emigration. And, sir, what is its power? I tell you its power is greater than that which is wielded by any potentate or emperor upon the face of God's footstool. If we can form a company, or a number of companies, which can control the emigration of this country—the foreign emigration and native emigration—I tell you, sir, that that company, or those companies, will have more power than any potentate or emperor upon the face of the earth; and that company, or those companies, may laugh at politicians; they may laugh, sir, at the President and his Cabinet: at the Supreme Court, or at Congress; for they cannot do a thing, in accordance with the Constitution of this land, which can in any way interfere with their progress, or prevent their making cities and States and nations wherever they please. Then, sir, there can be no doubt about the power of this agency, which, I tell you, is the right one for us to make use of in getting Central America for us, or in Americanizing Central America, as we are sure to do.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said nothing about annexing Central America to the United States. For myself, I care nothing about it, and I do not know whether the people of this country are ready for that proposition yet. I think, however, they would rather annex a thousand square leagues of territory than to lose a single square foot. To be sure, sir, we have a few men in the North who honestly hate this Union. I will not criticise their views. I will not condemn them for their views. They have a right to cherish just what views they please in relation to this question. Sir, there are still a larger number of sour and disappointed politicians who, though they do not profess hatred to this Union, do, to a certain extent, profess indifference as to its continuance. But the great and overwhelming majority of the people of the North, sir, as a unit, are determined that no force, internal or external, shall ever wrest from the jurisdiction of the United States a single square foot of our territory, unless it first be baptized in blood and fire. That is the sentiment of the great majority of the people of the North—that no portion of the territory of this Government shall ever be released from our possession. We understand that this Union is a partnership for life, and that the bonds that hold us together cannot by any fatuity be sundered until this great Government is first extinguished and its power annihilated. That, sir, is our sentiment about the Union, and such may be the present sentiment about annexation. But I have no doubt what the future sentiment of the country will be about annexation. I have no doubt we will have Central America in this Government, and all between this and Central America also.

Well, sir, we have now come to the grand missionary age of the world in which we do not send out preachers alone, perplexing people who are in ignorance and barbarism with abstract theological dogmas; but with the preachers, we send the church, we send the school, we send the mechanic and the farmer; we send all that makes up great and flourishing communities; we send the powers that build cities; we send steam-engines, sir, which are the greatest apostles of liberty that this country has ever seen. That is the modern kind of missionary emigration, and it has wonderful power on this continent, and is destined to have on the world, too, for it is just as good against one kind of evil as another; and it can as well be exerted against idol worship in Hindostan and China, as against oppression and despotism in Central America.

But we take the countries that are nearest first; and now we propose to use this mighty power in originating a nation in quick time for Central America. We read of a time when "a nation shall be born in a day." I think it may be done in some such way as this. By this method of emigration, carried on not by the solitary pioneer, "alone, unfriended, melancholy, slow," stealing away from the institutions of religion and education himself and family; but, sir, by this means, Christianity herself goes hand in hand with the pioneer; and not Christianity alone, but the offspring of Christianity, an awakened intelligence, and all the inventions of which she is the mother; creating all the differences between an advanced and enlightened community and one in degradation and ignorance. Sir, in years gone by, our emigration has ever tended toward barbarism. But now, by this method, it is tending to a higher civilization than we have ever witnessed. Why, sir, by this plan, a new community starts on as high a plane as the old one had ever arrived at; and leaving behind the dead and decayed branches which incumbered the old, with the vigorous energies of youth, it presses on and ascends. Sir, such a State will be the State of Kansas, eclipsing in its progress all the other States of this nation, because it was colonized in this way. The people, in this way, have not to serve half a century of probation in semi-barbarism. They begin with schools and churches, and you will see what the effect is upon communities that are so established.

But I will speak now of that which constitutes the peculiar strength of emigration of this kind, and that is, the profit of the thing. I have shown you how efficient it is, and I will now show you how the method works, to some extent. It is profitable for every one connected with it; it is profitable to the people where the colonies go; it is profitable to the people of the colonies; and it is profitable to the company, which is the guiding star and the protecting power of the colonies. It does good everywhere. It does evil nowhere.

Sir, you cannot resist a power like this. A good man often feels regret when he knows that by promoting a good cause he is at the same time sacrificing his own means of doing good, and is becoming weaker and weaker every day. It is a great drawback upon beneficent enterprises, even upon philanthropic and Christian enterprises, that the men who sustain them are lessening their own means of doing good by it. Sir, it is a great mistake to suppose that a good cause can only be sustained by the life-blood of its friends. But when a man can do a magnanimous act, when he can do a decidedly good thing, and at the same time make money by it, all his faculties are in harmony. [Laughter.] You do not need any great argument to induce men to take such a position, if you can only induce them to believe that such is the effect. Well, sir, such is the effect; and now let us apply it to the people of Central America. What reason will they have to complain if we send among them our colonies, organized in this way with their sub-soil plows, their crow-bars, their hoes, their shovels, and their garden-seeds? What reason will they have to complain? Why, the fact is, that unless our civilization is superior to theirs, the effort would, in the beginning, be a failure; it never can make one inch of progress. Then, sir, if we succeed at all, we succeed in planting a civilization there which is superior to theirs; we plant that or none. It is impossible for an inferior civilization to supplant a superior civilization except by violence, and it is almost impossible to do it in that way.

Well, sir, if we give them a better civilization, the tendency of that better civilization is to increase the value of real estate; for the value of property, the value of real estate, depends upon the character of the men who live upon the land, as well as upon the number of men who live upon it. Now, sir, we either make an absolute failure in this thing, and do not trouble them at all, or we give them a better civilization, and in addition to that, we give them wealth.

Thus, sir, with bands of steel we bind the people of Central America to us and to our interests, by going among them in this way, and they cannot have reason to complain, nor will they complain. If we had approached them in this way two years ago, without this miserable meddlesome method, induced and warranted, or supposed to be warranted, by the neutrality laws, we would have filled Central America to overflowing by this time, and would have had with us the blessings of every native citizen in that portion of country.

Now, sir, if such is the way, if such is the power, if such is the effect of this method, to the emigrants, and to the people among whom they settle, why should we not now adopt it in reference to Central America? And what is the method? Why, it is as plain and simple as it can be. It is just to form a moneyed corporation which shall have two hundred or five hundred thousand dollars capital; which shall then obtain and spread information through the country, by publications, indicating what are the natural resources of Central America, and the inducements to emigrate thither; showing how it is situated in relation to commerce, and how, of necessity, there must speedily be built upon that soil a flourishing Commonwealth. Then you have to apply a portion of these means to sending out steam-engines, and to building some hotels to accommodate the people who go there, and also some receiving houses for the emigrants. Establish there and encourage there the establishment of the mechanic arts, and I tell you that every steam-engine you send there will be the seat of a flourishing town; every one will be an argument for people to go there; for they talk louder than individuals a thousand times, and they are more convincing a thousand times, especially to an ignorant and degraded people, than anything men can say, because the argument is addressed to the senses; it makes them feel comfortable; it gives them good clothes; it gives them money. These are the arguments to address to an ignorant people, and not mere abstract dogmas about liberty and theology. Then let this company be organized so soon as you fix these neutrality laws so that we can get off without these vexatious executive interferences. [Laughter.] Then we shall see how the thing will work in Central America.

But, sir, I expect, when the people of the North shall hear that I am taking this view of the question, that the timid will be intensely terrified, and say that we are to have more slave States annexed to the Union. I have not the slightest apprehension of that result. It may be said that Yankees, when they get down into Central America, will, if the climate is suited for it, make use of slave labor. I have heard that argument before; and it has been asserted that the Yankees who go into slave States oftentimes turn slaveholders and outdo the southern men themselves. I have no doubt that they outdo them if they do anything in that line at all. [Laughter.] The Yankee has never become a slaveholder unless he has been forced to it by the social relations of the slave State where he lived; and the Yankee who has become a slaveholder, has, every day of his life thereafter, felt in his very bones the bad economy of the system. It could not be otherwise. Talk about our Yankees, who go to Central America, becoming slaveholders! Why, sir, we can buy a negro power, in a steam-engine, for ten dollars, [laughter,] and we can clothe and feed that power for one year for five dollars; [renewed laughter,] and are we the men to give $1,000 for an African slave, and $150 a year to feed and clothe him? No, sir. Setting aside the arguments about sentimentality, and about philanthropy, on this question; setting aside all poetry and fiction, he comes right down to the practical question—is it profitable? The Yankee replies, "not at all." Then there is no danger of men who go from Boston to Central America ever owning slaves, unless they are compelled to by their social relations there. If a man goes from Boston into Louisiana, and nobody will speak to him unless he has a slave; nobody will invite him to a social entertainment unless he owns a negro; and if he cannot get a wife unless he has a negro; then, sir, very likely he may make up his mind to own a negro. [Laughter.] But I tell you that he will repent of it every day while he has him. There is no inducement for the Yankees to spread slavery into Central America, and there is no power in any other part of the country to do it. Therefore, most fearlessly do I advocate the Americanizing of Central America. We must have some outlet for our overwhelming population. Necessity knows no law; and if we cannot have Central America, we must have the Indian territory; we must have something; we are not exhausted in our power of emigration; we are worse off than we were before the opening of Kansas. Not one half of our natural increase has been exhausted in colonizing that Territory, and furnishing people for Oregon and Washington. We might, as I told you, make eight States a year, if we only used our forces economically; and we will use them economically by establishing, not for the present time only, but for all coming time, this system of organized emigration. Just as fast as this has become understood in the country—just as fast as it is known to the people—not a single man who has any sense will emigrate in any other way than by colonies. Just look at the difference between men going in a colony and going alone. Suppose a man goes to Central America, and settles there alone: what is his influence upon real estate by settling there alone? There is no appreciable difference from what it was before; but if he goes there with five hundred men from the city of Boston to establish a town, by that very act he has made himself wealthy. I can point to numerous examples of this kind. Hence this making money by organized emigration is not going to be speedily relinquished. Depend upon it that we have only begun to use it, and that we have not used it with the efficiency with which it will be used in a year to come.

Now, sir, for these reasons I hope that the committee to which this question shall be referred, will so modify and elucidate the neutrality laws that we shall not hereafter be subjected to this executive interference. And, in accordance with the views I have expressed, I now offer the following amendment:

And also, that said committee report, so far as they may be able, the present social and political condition of the people of Nicaragua, and whether they invite colonies from the United States to settle among them; and also, whether the soil, climate, and other natural advantages of that country are such as to encourage emigration thither from the northern States of this Confederacy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will state, briefly, my reasons for submitting that amendment. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] referred to the social and political condition of the people of Central America as a proper basis, I think he said, for our action. For myself, I am willing to take the gentleman's words about the necessity of something being done to aid these people; but in grave matters of legislation like this, the committee having the subject in charge should first fully investigate in reference to the matters suggested by my amendment.

I do not intend any objectionable sectionalism by using the word northern; that the committee should inquire whether the natural advantages of soil and climate of Central America were such as to invite emigration thither from the northern States. I so phrased the amendment because, as I have shown you, the northern States are the only ones which can furnish emigration that would be of any consequence to Central America. We would be glad to receive whatever help the States on the Gulf could give us, but it is impossible for them to give much help in this work. And because the northern States have the power in this matter, and because the southern States have not the power, I have used the words that the committee shall inquire specially whether the climate and the soil are such as to encourage emigration to Central America from the northern States. If, however, there be objection to it, I will strike out the word "northern," and leave the inquiry to be general.

Mr. ADRAIN. It is the interest and policy of this Government to cultivate the most friendly relations with all other Powers. Such has been the policy of our Government from its foundation down to the present period. It is a policy that has preserved our domestic peace; it is a policy which has preserved us from foreign war; a policy which has enabled our citizens to pursue their various avocations in peace; a policy which has given rise to a wide and extensive commerce, until our ships are now floating proudly upon every sea. It is a wise and a judicious policy; a policy adopted by the first President of this great and powerful nation; and it is for this Government to determine whether that policy shall be abandoned, or whether another policy shall be pursued which will interrupt our friendly and peaceful relations with foreign nations. How can those friendly relations be preserved unless our Government takes some effective and stringent measures for the purpose of putting a stop to these military expeditions that are forming in our midst to go out and prey upon the property and lives of those who are at peace with us? And the President of the United States, in his message, calls the attention of the House to this subject, and proposes that we shall give to it our most serious and deliberate consideration.

The neutrality laws which are upon our statute-books are not sufficient to put a stop to this marauding spirit, which is likely to bring us into difficulty with foreign Powers, and which interrupts our peace and excites the hostility of foreign nations against us. As this is the case, I hope that when this matter is referred to the committee, our laws will be so changed and so modified as not to give fuller license to this marauding spirit, but to prevent and check it.

Now, sir, it is proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi that these neutrality laws should be abolished, or altered in such a way that they shall not infringe what he conceives to be the rights of American citizens. Now, sir, I am not in favor of having the rights of American citizens interfered with at all by the Government. But what are those rights? What right has any citizen of the United States to band together with others to form these military expeditions to go out to make war upon foreign Powers? I deny the right. Every American citizen has the right of leaving his country, of expatriating himself if he please, and of seeking and receiving protection in another country. But his right does not extend so far as to allow him to get up a military expedition for the purpose of making war upon those Powers that are at peace with us, when those military expeditions interfere with our great national interests.

These neutrality laws, Mr. Chairman, are founded upon the great law of nations. Laws have been passed from the period of Washington's administration to the present time, founded upon this great law. Now what is this law of nations? Although this law, by some nations, has been disregarded, yet it is a law which is founded upon morality, justice, and humanity. Every nation ought to do as much good to another in peace, and as little harm in war, as possible. I have here a standard book upon the law of nations, and I beg leave to call the attention of the House to a few remarks of the late Chancellor Kent, when treating upon this subject. He says:

"The faithful observance of this law is essential to national character, and to the happiness of mankind. According to the observation of Montesquieu, it is founded on the principle, that different nations ought to do each other as much good in peace, and as little harm in war, as possible, without injury to their true interests.

"We ought not, therefore, to separate the science of public law from that of ethics, nor encourage the dangerous suggestion, that Governments are not so strictly bound by the obligations of truth, justice, and humanity, in relation to other Powers, as they are in the management of their own local concerns. States, or bodies-politic, are to be considered as moral persons, having a public will, capable and free to do right and wrong, inasmuch as they are collections of individuals, each of whom carries with him into the service of the community the same binding law of morality and religion which ought to control his conduct in private life. The law of nations is a complex system, composed of various ingredients. It consists of general principles of right and justice, equally suitable to the government of individuals in a state of natural equality, and to the relation and conduct of nations; of a collection of usages and customs, the growth of civilization and commerce; and of a code of conventional or positive law. In the absence of these latter regulations, the intercourse and conduct of nations are to be governed by principles fairly to be deduced from the rights and duties of nations, and the nature of moral obligation; and we have the authority of the lawyers of antiquity, and of some of the first masters in the modern school of public law, for placing the moral obligation of nations and of individuals on similar grounds, and for considering individual and national morality as parts of one and the same science."

Here, sir, are the principles upon which the law of nations is based. They are correct principles, and I maintain that there is a moral obligation resting upon our nation, as well as a moral obligation resting upon every individual, to observe them. What right has any one to deprive another of his property or his life? If he does it, the law punishes him; and if he gives out an indication of his intention to commit a crime, the restraint of the law is put upon him, and he is bound over to keep the peace. If this is so, has not the Government an equal right to prevent its citizens from committing depredations upon others who are at peace with us? Have not they the moral obligation to prevent injury to their neighbors? Is not that just? Is it not morally right? And is it not humane?

Therefore I maintain that the neutrality laws of our country are founded upon the great law of nations, which commends itself to the judgment and conscience of every right-thinking man. This law of nations is of modern growth. The ancient Republics knew nothing about it; they knew nothing of right or wrong, and they paid no regard to the rights and property of others. We all know that the best fleets of Athens went out upon these piratical excursions to deprive others of their property and their lives. It is for us—for this Government—for this great people, to determine whether we will go back to those ancient times and imitate these piratical excursions, or whether we will keep our citizens within the restraints of law and morality and justice.

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of putting a stop to this marauding spirit that is afloat in this country. It is a mischievous, dangerous spirit. It is a spirit that has done no good, but a great deal of harm. It is a spirit that has excited the bad passions of the youth of our country. It is a spirit that has led them to disobey the laws of our country, to disrespect our Government, to disregard the property and lives of others. It is a spirit, sir, which has interfered with the great transit routes between the two oceans; and the President tells us in his message that, in consequence of that interference, our citizens have sustained heavy losses. These are some of the effects of this marauding spirit; and yet the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] and other gentlemen here, would have us encourage that spirit instead of restraining it. If our neutrality laws, as they now exist, cannot restrain men in this country from doing what they ought not to do, from committing unlawful acts, in the name of common sense what will they do if the restraints of the existing laws are removed?

Mr. QUITMAN. I challenge the gentleman to refer to a single word that I have ever uttered approving of a marauding spirit, or approving of illegal transactions. And it is a very remarkable fact, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the relations existing between us and the Central American States, that the very State which could complain of marauding expeditions having been sent against it from this country—I refer to Nicaragua—is now upon terms of greater amity with the United States than another State against which such expeditions have never been directed—I refer to Paraguay. The President has informed us that we are upon terms of hostility with that State, against which no expeditions have ever been directed from the United States.

But, sir, I merely rose for the purpose of saying that I have never, here or elsewhere, in any speech, advocated, and that I do not now advocate, a marauding spirit or any violation of the law of nations. But the gentleman from New Jersey has not looked into the law of nations, if he deduces from it a support for the neutrality law of 1818, for that act is in almost every feature violative of the law of nations.

Mr. ADRAIN. It may be that I have not examined the subject with sufficient care, and I may not be as well acquainted with it as the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi; but I am satisfied of one thing—that it is the bounden duty of Government not to annul the neutrality laws of the country, but, if anything, to increase them and make them more stringent. I do not wish, nor do I intend, to misrepresent the gentleman. Far from it. I was merely arguing from the position which he took in regard to the neutrality laws. I certainly understood him to disapprove of them; and the very fact of his moving to refer this subject to a special committee, was an evidence that he did not wish it to go to the Judiciary Committee; that he had some specific purpose, and that that purpose was to have a special committee raised to carry out his peculiar views.

Mr. Chairman, it has been proposed here, upon this floor—and I must say that it struck me with great astonishment—that we should send General Walker and his men back to Nicaragua. It is said that Commodore Paulding did an illegal act when he arrested General Walker, and sent him back to this country. It may be so. That act may have been illegal; the commodore may have gone beyond the line of his instructions. When we have all the facts and the law from the President, as I hope we will have in a few days, we will then fully understand whether he went beyond his instructions or not.

But suppose he did; suppose he had no right to bring General Walker back, under his instructions: are we to send Walker and his men back again, when the President says they went out on an unlawful predatory expedition, and that their acts were acts of murder and robbery? Why, sir, by so doing this Government would indorse those acts of robbery and murder. Are we prepared to do that? Will this Government do that? Because Commodore Paulding, in his zeal for the interests of his country, and his love and respect for our Government, has exceeded the letter of his instructions, are we to sanction or countenance proceedings which the President has condemned in his message?

Suppose, now, that we send Walker and his men back: I say that if this Government should take such a step, it would give the Nicaraguan Government direct cause for war, and it might actually lead to war. Suppose Walker and his men are sent down there in one of our national ships, under our national flag, and when about to land are met by an opposing force: what then? We have resolved to send them back, and that opposing force refuses to permit them to come back. To fulfill our pledge to Walker, we must carry him and his men through, and plant them in the very position from which they were taken; and do not gentlemen see at once the consequences which would flow from that act?

I am not willing, Mr. Chairman, as a general rule, to allow either our civil or military officers to transcend their duty or go beyond the line of their instructions; but there may be circumstances in a particular case which will palliate if not justify their conduct in doing so. What did Commodore Paulding do? Why, he did the very thing that the Government wanted done. I do not mean to say that the Government wanted Commodore Paulding to lay his hand upon Walker and his men upon a foreign soil, but it wanted this expedition broken up; it wanted to stop the depredations of Walker and his men upon the rights and property of States with which we are at peace. I say, therefore, that Commodore Paulding did the very thing that the Government wanted done, so far as the results were concerned; and in doing that he did an act which will be approved, as I conceive, so far as those results are concerned, by the Government and by a large majority of the people of this country. I am not ready to condemn one of the bravest and most gallant commanders in our Navy for such an act. His motives were good. His intentions were right. He knew what the Government wanted, and he wished to accomplish it. It was accomplished. Walker and his men are back in this country; and I pray God that he may never get away from it again, but that such restraints may be put upon him as will make him obey the neutrality laws, as he pledged himself to do.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to ask the gentleman from New Jersey one question. He says that Commodore Paulding knew what the Government wanted.

Mr. ADRAIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is not what I said. I said that Commodore Paulding knew what the Government wanted, as far as his instructions would indicate.

Mr. KEITT. How did he know what the Government wanted?

Mr. ADRAIN. He knew that the Government wanted a stop put to these marauding expeditions. That he knew.

Mr. KEITT. Did he know that the Government wanted him to arrest Walker and his men on the island of Punta Arenas, and bring them back to this country?

Mr. ADRAIN. No, sir. He did not know it; and he admits in his letter, like a brave, frank man, that he went beyond the line of his instructions. He assumed the whole responsibility himself. But, sir, he is not the first man who has taken the responsibility of going beyond the line of his duty. We have the example of General Jackson, the brave and illustrious old hero, out of respect to whose memory this House has just passed a resolution for an adjournment until Monday next. Sir, that glorious old hero loved to assume responsibilities, and the country admired and rewarded him for it.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, much interest in the progress of free principles. I did not hear very distinctly the gentleman who last addressed the House, [Mr. THAYER,] but I have no doubt he made a very able speech from what I did hear. I am as much interested in the spread of free and liberal principles as that gentleman or any gentleman upon this floor, but it must be done in the right way. Gentlemen may entertain different views as to what is the right way; and according to the theory and genius of our institutions each man has the right to think and act for himself. Other gentlemen claim that privilege, and I trust I shall be allowed to exercise the same privilege for myself. Therefore, I say that if free and liberal principles are to go abroad, are to be disseminated—if free Governments are to be established in other countries where they do not exist now, it is not to be done by fire and sword, but by the peaceful example of our own free and enlightened Government. Our Government is a Government of peace. Our Government is a Government which endeavors to avoid entangling alliances with foreign Powers, and to give them no just cause of offense. We wish to adopt the great principles of morality and humanity towards other nations, so that they may see that we are a just and an honest people. If we are not, then our Government is not fit to be imitated. Therefore, I am against the spread of free principles—against the Americanization of Central America, in any other way than by peaceful emigration. That is the way which is proposed by the President of the United States, and it is the only legitimate way. It is the only way compatible with the neutrality laws of the Government, founded upon the great law of nations. I care not how many men may emigrate to Central America and settle there, if they please. The gentleman from Massachusetts, who has talked so much about emigration, if he pleases to emigrate there peacefully and quietly, may go; though, from the specimen of a speech which he gave us to-day, I should regret that we would not have another opportunity to hear further from him.

Mr. Chairman, it is a fortunate circumstance that this discussion has arisen in regard to the neutrality laws of this country. I had supposed, at first, when this subject was introduced, that it was premature. I thought it would have been better to wait until the President had given us the necessary information upon the subject, in answer to the resolutions which the House has passed. But, I do not think that it is premature to discuss the neutrality laws, or to meet the great question of raising these military expeditions to go out from our midst and prey upon the lives and property of our neighbors; I am as desirous as the gentleman from Mississippi, or any other gentleman, can be, that these questions should be met, and met soon; and that the voice of this Congress, and the voice of this nation should be heard upon this subject.

I regretted very much to hear the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HASKIN,] who spoke yesterday upon this subject, go, as it seemed to me he did, a little too far in stating the opinions of the northern Democracy in relation to Walker and his followers. That gentleman took the ground, as I understood him, of opposition to all such private enterprises. He was opposed to Walker and his men going out in the way they did; but he countenanced such expeditions upon the part of the Government; in other words, he was opposed to petit larceny, but was in favor of grand larceny. I hold in my hand his reported speech, which represents him as uttering these sentiments. Sir, if they are his sentiments, they are not the sentiments of the Democracy of the North. They are not the sentiments of the people of my district, or of my State. We are an honest people. We believe in morality and justice. We have been brought up to be honest. We do not believe in grand larceny any more than we do in petit larceny, and I know my colleagues will concur with me in the sentiments which I utter. We are opposed to individuals taking the lives or property of others, and we are opposed to the Government doing the same thing. I do not concur with the gentleman in recommending the Government to follow the example of England. England has not furnished us an example which, I think, we should follow. She has not adhered to the great law of nations. She has committed depredations upon the rights of others which have disgraced her in the eyes of all nations, and ought to disgrace her. I am not willing that this Government should copy the example of England, or any example which is not in accordance with the principles of right, justice, and humanity.

Mr. Chairman, I will not trouble the committee further. I have already extended my remarks further than I intended. I feel a deep interest in this subject. It is an interest which every American citizen ought to feel, and it is an interest which is taken by the Government itself. The President of the United States, in his message, says:

"It is one of the first and highest duties of an independent State, in its relations with the members of the great family of nations, to restrain its people from acts of hostile aggression against their citizens or subjects. The most eminent writers on public law do not hesitate to denounce such hostile acts as robbery and murder."

Those are the sentiments of the President. They are right sentiments, and I am willing to sustain him in them. I believe that this House and the whole country will sustain him. And when this matter is reported back, as it will be, from the Committee on the Judiciary, I hope that we will have such laws passed as will define specifically the duties of American citizens, giving them the rights which justly belong to them, and depriving them of the power of committing the mischiefs which, the President in his message says, are great wrongs of robbery and murder.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to say at this time about the neutrality laws or William Walker. I shall speak to-day of Kansas and the Lecompton constitution. On the 30th day of May, A. D. 1854, the memorable act, entitled "An act to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas," was passed by the Congress of the United States. Among its provisions was the following:

"That the Constitution, and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Kansas as elsewhere within the United States, except the eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March sixth, eighteen hundred and twenty, which, being inconsistent with the principle of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized by the legislation of eighteen hundred and fifty, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void: it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive or put in force any law or regulation which may have existed prior to the act of sixth March, eighteen hundred and twenty, either protecting, establishing, prohibiting, or abolishing slavery."

The principle involved in this denial to Congress of the power and duty, under the Constitution, to legislate in respect to slavery in the Territories—to its inventor, (for it was a new thing under the sun,) the present Secretary of State, if not to the country, the direful spring of unnumbered woes—was founded upon the assumption that with the people of the Territories resided the right to manage their own affairs, to regulate their social, domestic, and local concerns in their own way; and that this right had been practically conceded to them in reference to all local and domestic questions but one—that of slavery. And it was maintained that the intervention of Congress in respect to this single question of slavery was invidious, unjust, and unconstitutional, and ought to be terminated by a solemn declaration and abnegation by Congress; so that, hereafter, in all sections of the country, it should be distinctly understood that the people of all the Territories are to be left "to form and regulate their domestic institutions"—all of them—"in their own way;" that they should be as free to decide in reference to slavery as any other of these questions, and be governed by one and the same rule concerning all of them. To show that I have stated correctly the grounds upon which this provision of the Kansas-Nebraska act was advocated or defended by those who voted for it, I will read some brief extracts from the speeches of leading Democrats, made in Congress while this measure was pending before that body; and I may properly commence with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Territories in the Senate, the Senator from Illinois. Judge DOUGLAS, repeating what he had said on a previous occasion, spoke as follows:

"The position that I have ever taken has been that this, [the slavery question,] and all other questions relating to the domestic affairs and domestic policy of the Territories, ought to be left to the decision of the people themselves, and that we ought to be content with whatever way they would decide the question, because they have a much deeper interest in these matters than we have; and know much better what institutions suit them than we, who have never been there, can decide for them."

The Secretary of State, General Cass, then a Senator from Michigan, exultingly hailed the triumph of "squatter sovereignty," when the Nebraska bill passed the Senate. He had previously made an elaborate speech in its favor, in which he labored to prove that the people of the Territories, as well as of the States, ought to be permitted to determine for themselves in regard to all their local institutions. He said:

"We know we cannot touch their domestic hearths, nor their domestic altars; their family and social relations; their wives nor their children; their men-servants nor their maid-servants; their houses, their farms, nor their property, without a gross violation of the inalienable rights of man, consecrated by the blood of our fathers, and hallowed by the affections of their sons."

The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,]

it will be remembered, took an active and leading part in engineering this bill through the House of Representatives. That you may understand why he desired it might become a law, I will read a short passage from a speech which he made in this House on the 17th of February, 1854:

"And where do you, calling yourselves Democrats from the North, stand upon this great question of popular rights? Do you consider it Democratic to exercise the high prerogative of stifling the voice of the adventurous pioneer, and restricting his suffrage in a matter concerning his own interest, happiness, and government, which he is much more capable of deciding than you are? As for myself and the friends of the Nebraska bill, we think that our fellow-citizens who go to the frontier, penetrate the wilderness, cut down the forests, till the soil, erect school-houses and churches; extend civilization, and lay the foundation of future States and Empires, do not lose, by their change of place in hope of bettering their condition, either their capacity for self-government, or their just rights to exercise it, conformably to the Constitution of the United States."

"We of the South are willing that they should exercise it upon the subject of the condition of the African race among them, AS WELL AS UPON OTHER QUESTIONS OF DOMESTIC POLICY."

Such, sir, were the arguments and considerations upon which the friends of the Nebraska bill urged its adoption by Congress. There were, to be sure, a few gentlemen in both Houses who supported the measure on different grounds; who repudiated and scouted the doctrine of popular sovereignty as advocated by the gentlemen from whose speeches I have quoted; but they were not the active and efficient men upon whose efforts its success depended, although they may have been the parties who compelled its introduction. And I assert, without fear of contradiction from any intelligent quarter, that the avowed purpose for which the Nebraska bill, in the shape which it finally assumed, was enrolled upon the statute-book of the United States, was to assure to the people of the Territories the right to make such rules and regulations, laws and ordinances, affecting their domestic interests and systems, of whatever character, as they should see fit. Were it necessary to fortify this allegation by additional testimony to the same effect with that which I have adduced, it could be found in more than fifty speeches filling the columns of the Appendix to the Congressional Globe for the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress.

Such were the reasons assigned for the enactment of this law by its influential and efficient friends; and to those of their number who, by their subsequent action in attempting in good faith to secure to the people the untrammelled exercise of this right, prove that they were really actuated by the motives which they professed, we may yield our respect, while we must continue to lament that they should have fallen into errors so grave and so vital. The design of the section of the bill which I have read was not, as the President would imply, in giving the people of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska the power to vote on the question of slavery, to deprive them of the opportunity to vote on other questions of domestic interest; but that the right which it was assumed they already possessed and had long enjoyed, to act on these questions, should be extended to the question of slavery. And from the premises of the Senators and Representatives upon whose labors the incorporation of this section into the Kansas-Nebraska act in the main depended, an argument in its favor of very considerable plausibility was founded; and the only argument that had any influence in reconciling the northern Democracy to the abrogation of the Missouri compromise.

Thus, I think, I have shown, that if the members of Congress who voted for the Nebraska bill knew what they were about, the President is very much in error in asserting that its provisions do not contemplate the same submission to the people of all questions of interest to them, that he says is required in respect to the slavery question.

The opponents of this act denied that the people of the Territories possessed the absolute and exclusive right of legislation in regard to their domestic affairs. They did not yield their assent to the arguments to which I have referred, for they did not understand that the people of the Territories possessed any legislative powers as of unconditional right. They believed that Congress might, if it saw proper, make all the laws and regulations for the Territories of the United States, so long as they should remain Territories. So far as the question of constitutional power to legislate for these inchoate political communities was concerned, they never doubted that it was vested in the Congress of the United States; and they knew that this opinion had never been questioned, from the foundation of the Government down to 1847; that it had been expressly affirmed and acted upon by all the departments of the Government—by all Presidents, Cabinets, and Congresses—during a period of sixty years; and had many times and often, and with great earnestness, been propounded as the true doctrine, even by those who were then laboring so zealously for its overthrow; and particularly did they remember that the Supreme Court of the United States, while the great and guiding mind of Marshall presided over its deliberations, had decided specifically, in the leading case of the American and Ocean Insurance Company vs. Canter, (1 Pet. s. 11.) that Congress had full, plenary, and exclusive legislative power over the Territories; and let me remark that they will not overlook the fact now—and to it I beg to call the particular attention of the House—that this opinion has recently been sustained by the same tribunal, in the most emphatic manner, in the celebrated case of Dred Scott vs. Sanford, in which it is expressly stated that Congress has general power to legislate for the Territories. So that if there were no constitutional inhibition in reference to the exclusion of slavery, its legislation in the passage of the Missouri compromise would have been rightful and valid. The Supreme Court agree with the Republicans in denying the doctrine of popular sovereignty in the Territories, as asserted by the ostensible authors and most active promoters of the Nebraska act, and in affirming the power of Congress to make laws for the government of these incipient States, in all cases and for all purposes, except in so far as it is restrained by the Constitution. That I do not err in this statement, appears from the following extract from the opinion of Chief Justice Taney, in the case of Scott vs. Sanford:

"It is thus clear from the whole opinion on this point, that the court [in Insurance Company vs. Canter] did not mean to decide whether the power [to govern the Territories] was derived from the clause in the Constitution, or was the necessary consequence of the right to acquire. They do decide that the power in Congress is unquestionable, and in this we entirely concur, and nothing will be found in this opinion to the contrary. 'The power stands firmly on the latter alternative put by the Court—that is, as 'the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory.'"

So much for the Nicholson letter! So much for "squatter sovereignty!"

It will be seen that the court fully agree with the Republicans in repudiating, root and branch, length and breadth, the dogma of popular sovereignty; but differ from them in holding that the Constitution has forbidden the interference of Congress for the restriction of slavery. The Republicans, maintaining the existence of this general power in Congress, insist that it extends to all proper subjects of legislation in the Territories—the question of slavery included. And they agree with Senator Douglas and General Cass, that it has no more power over slavery than it has over other questions of domestic policy and interest.

Mr. Chairman, the position of the Republicans is this: that the people who voluntarily remove to our Territories, do so with a full knowledge that until the time shall come for the admission of the Territories as States, as provided by the Constitution, they are liable to be governed by such laws and regulations as may be provided for them by Congress; and this liability arises, they hold, as well from the express language of the Constitution as from the direct and unavoidable implication in which it has been discovered by the Supreme Court.

And not only has this view of the powers of Congress been entertained by all branches of the Government down to a recent period, including the Supreme Court from the day of its organization to the present, but it has also been recognized in this very case by the friends of popular sovereignty themselves; for they, and all of them, in their votes on the Nebraska bill, which provided for the organization of the Territories on such conditions and with such powers as Congress saw fit to incorporate and confer, denied to the people, in the most direct and unequivocal manner, that right of self-government which they had so loudly vaunted. They hampered them by restrictions wholly incompatible with the idea that they were to be "perfectly free" "to form their own institutions in their own way," from one end of the bill to the other; by provisions relating to the appointment of the executive, judicial, and ministerial officers of the Territories, defining the scope of the legislative powers of these communities, and subjecting their enactments to the qualified veto of an officer of the Federal Government; and by recognizing an absolute necessity for congressional intervention before any sort of a territorial organization could take place. If the Territories may be, and must be, called into existence by Congress, Congress, the creator, may impose such conditions and restrictions, under the Federal Constitution, as it may deem proper.

But the Republicans hold, that although the legislative power resides, and of necessity must reside, in Congress, it may be committed by the latter, in whole, or in part, into the hands of the people of the Territories; or, in other words, that Congress may govern through the instrumentality of Territorial Legislatures, whose action being subject to its approval or rejection, becomes, in effect, the action of that body. They also believe that it is wise and expedient to delegate to the people of the Territories the power to make, or rather to initiate, the laws and regulations in regard to such matters, systems, and institutions as are purely local, and affect only themselves; but that there are subjects, not of a merely local character, which should be reserved for the exclusive legislation of Congress. Of such was the question of slavery, or no slavery, in Kansas; as it affected, not only the people of that Territory, but also of all the States, the interest and welfare, the peace and prosperity of all.

It was a question in which the people of Maine and the people of Texas were interested. The people of Maine believe that their interests are affected unfavorably by any act which extends slavery and enlarges its power in the country and in Congress, gives to the Representatives of servile labor increased power to protect and promote the particular and special interests of those who live upon such labor at the expense, and it may be to the destruction, of free labor—of labor that owns itself and claims the right to protect itself as vital and sacred. And so they said to their Representatives in 1820, and have said to them ever since, while in all matters affecting the people of the Territories alone, it will be well for you to allow them to make their own laws, in those which concern not only them, but us also, reserve the power to yourselves and to us, whose agents you are, that our rights may be preserved and our interests protected. Grant not the power to the enemies of our institutions—the Mormons for example—to go on to our own territory, purchased by our blood or treasure, or both, and there establish schemes and systems of wrong and immorality and violence, discreditable to the age, and disgraceful to the country, and which, if not checked will undermine the institutions of Christianity and civilization, which are at once the buttments and defenses of republican liberty.

Upon this point I rejoice to be able to bring to my support the opinion of one of the wisest men the Republic has ever known, and whose authority in a question of this character yields to that of no other name. I refer to James Madison, from whose writings I read thus:

"Every addition the States receive to their number of slaves tends to weaken and render them less capable of self-defense. In case of hostilities with foreign nations, they will be the means of inviting attack instead of repelling invasion. It is a necessary duty of the General Government to protect every part of their confines against dangers, as well internal as external. Everything, therefore, which tends to increase danger, though it be a local affair, yet, if it involves national expense or safety, becomes of concern to every part of the Union, and is a proper subject for the consideration of those charged with the general administration of the Government."

Mr. Chairman, for these reasons, the representatives from Maine, in both branches of the National Legislature, with a single exception, opposed the passage of the Nebraska bill. Not only were they persuaded that Congress had power to pass the Missouri restriction, and that it was an exercise of authority as wise as it was legitimate, but they were impressed with the conviction that solemn and peculiar obligations and guarantees were attached to it which should have prevented its violation. And they could each of them well say with General Cass, in the speech which he made in favor of its repeal:

"I had no design whatever to take such a step, [to annul the Missouri compromise,] and thus recuscitate from its quietude a deed of conciliation which had done its work, and done it well, and which was hallowed by patriotism, by success, and by association with great names now transferred to history. It belonged to a past generation; and in the midst of a political tempest, which appalled the wisest and the firmest in the land, it had said to the waves of agitation, 'Peace, be still;' and they became still. It would have been better, in my opinion, never to have disturbed its slumber, as all useful and practical objects could have been obtained without it."

Further, they opposed the bill because they perceived that although it was to be passed for the alleged purpose of according to the people of the Territory the right of self-government, this right—so to call it—was, in fact, withheld and denied, and because they saw clearly that the prime movers (I will not say the skillful engineers) of the bill neither desired nor intended to have this dogma of popular sovereignty established. The enemies of the bill said that these men were, in a very quiet and cautious manner, keeping themselves in position to deny and ridicule this doctrine whenever, in the ripening of events, it should be for their interest to do so; and that, in permitting the bill to pass as it did, they only desired to remove a great practical obstruction to the spread of slavery, with a view to the ultimate nationalizing of the system, and making its security, protection, and prosperity, the one great, central, national idea, in the policy and the politics of the country; and they did not doubt that if these men—those who, since the death of General Jackson, had dictated the policy of the Democratic party of the nation—should be successful in the work then in hand, they would labor with increased vigor and confidence for the consummation of their ulterior purposes. And in this connection I hope I may be permitted, as matter of history and in confirmation, to some extent, of what I have now said, to read from a speech which I had the honor to make in this House while the Nebraska bill was pending before it:

"Well, sir, as I have said, the drama of non-intervention, after this one performance, will be removed from the stage forever. As we sometimes read on the bills, it is 'positively for one night only.' Whether it shall accomplish the abrogation of the Missouri compromise or not, it will have filled its destiny. In the former case, it will be thrown overboard by the South as a thing for which they never had any respect, and now have no further use. Then we shall hear that the time has come for the incineration of the true doctrine: 'The North is sufficiently weakened and humbled; the country is ready for it; let it be proclaimed everywhere, that the Constitution of the United States, proprio vigore, carries slavery wherever the flag of the Union flies.' It carries it, we shall be told, into the Territories, and neither Congress nor the local Legislatures, nor both combined, can restrain its march, for the Constitution is above both, is the supreme law of the land. Ay, and carries it into all the States, for neither State laws nor State constitutions can exclude the enjoyment of a right guaranteed by the Constitution of the Federal Government. This, sir, is the doctrine with which we shall be vigorously pressed if this bill is carried. Already has it been more than hinted, and whoever has noticed the advanced ground which slavery occupies now, compared with that on which it rested in 1850, will not be slow to believe it."

"I will here ask your attention to the fact, which I meant to have noticed before, that Senator HUNTER, of Virginia, the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLAYMAN,] and nearly all southern gentlemen who have spoken on this subject, and have in any manner recognized the doctrine of non-intervention, are careful to limit the right of the people of the Territories to legislate for themselves, by the Constitution of the United States; and that they hold that the Constitution forbids all territorial legislation for the prohibition of slavery."

"And in this connection let me remark, what you must have observed, that in the debate which took place in the Senate a few days ago on the Badger amendment, it was distinctly stated by southern Senators, that in the event of future acquisitions of territory, no implication was to be drawn from this bill that the people of such territory should be allowed to decide for themselves the question of the admission of slavery."

"In view of these facts, northern gentlemen will perceive how transcendently important it is for them to make, while they are yet able, a successful stand against the aggressions of the slave power."

It required no extraordinary degree of foresight to predict what would follow the repeal of the Missouri compromise. The slaveholding oligarchy might use popular sovereignty for a special purpose; but for them, as a principle of general application, it was not entirely safe. They had discovered that their system of servile labor was one which required continual bracing and strengthening. It is in its nature, as all things false and violent are, self-destructive. It must have scope and room for expansion, or it dies; blasting the earth wherever it treads, it must have "fresh woods and pastures new," or it starves. It must be protected from without, and its defenses and supports must be placed beyond the contingencies of public opinion, and out of the reach of ordinary assault; therefore, it must be guarded by constitutional sanctions. Hence the Dred Scott opinion—interpreted by President Buchanan, in his letter to Professor Silliman and others, as containing the doctrine, as it undoubtedly does, that the Constitution of the United States affixes, in certain cases, to persons of African descent, the character of property—stamps them with the mark of chattels. If this be sound doctrine, it is plain that the Constitution carries slavery, not only into the Territories, but into the States; for whatever it makes property, no State law or constitution can declare shall not be property.

Sir, this is a monstrous doctrine; and that it is necessary to be maintained, only proves the mischievous and desperate character of the system for whose protection it is invoked. If it is the true doctrine, then was the Constitution ordained not to secure the "blessings of liberty" to the people of this country, but to fix upon them forever a system regarded by its framers, and all the early statesmen, as without foundation in natural right or sound policy; then must it be admitted that the great end and object of the Constitution was to establish or protect slavery everywhere within the range of its operations. For if it recognizes, and was intended to recognize, property in slaves to such an extent that it is not within the power of a State (or Territory) by its laws, to forbid the existence of this relation within its own jurisdiction, it does, in regard to property in slaves, what it has never been understood to effect in respect to property in anything else—it makes a fundamental distinction between slave property and all other kinds of property. It has never been held that the Constitution gives to horses, oxen, carriages, or anything else, the character of property, in the sense in which it is understood by the President and by the Supreme Court to affix that character to negroes held to service. The legislative power of a State or Territory may, without doubt, declare that there shall be no property in liquors of domestic manufacture, in bank notes, in horses, in carriages without wheels or with wheels or with wide wheels or narrow wheels, or in oxen, as I am informed the Legislature of Missouri has already done. Nobody, I presume, questions the existence of this power in the States. It is exercised by them every day. Deny it to them, and they are deprived of one of their most important functions. What power but that of the people of the several States can decide what shall be treated as property within their respective jurisdictions? Shall the Federal Government exercise this power? If so, whence is it derived? Does the Constitution declare what is property in New York or Pennsylvania? If so, what becomes of the police powers of the States? No, sir; this right to declare what may be held and recognized as property exists in the several States, each for itself, and nowhere else.

Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding these and other objections on the part of the true friends of self-government and of the Constitution, the Nebraska bill became a law, and the Missouri compromise was abrogated and destroyed. The opponents of slavery extension were beaten, but their responsibilities to the Territories, to the country, and to the cause of human nature, did not cease with this defeat. An opportunity to labor for the preservation of the Territories remained; and duty and consistency alike enjoined upon them the obligation of taking care, so far as they had the power, that the act for organizing the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas should be honestly executed. They could not restore the Missouri compromise—they attempted to do it in the last Congress and failed—but they could say to the Democratic party, you have passed this bill for the avowed purpose of enabling the people of these Territories to decide for themselves in reference to slavery as well as other questions of interest to them; we fear that some of your number are determined that they shall not do so unless they decide in a particular way. To you, therefore, who really believed in what you called popular sovereignty, and who in good faith promoted the passage of this law for the reasons which you urged with so much earnestness and persistency, we look to take care that what you alleged were its genuine objects, shall be faithfully carried out; and as the best, and as all that we can now do, we pledge ourselves to act with you, if you will permit it, and if not, to act without you, in honest purpose, to secure to the people of these new communities an opportunity to exclude slavery therefrom if they shall so desire. You were pledged to protect them in the exercise of this grant, or right, if you please to call it so—pledged by your speeches, your resolutions, your presses, by the messages of your late, and the inaugural address of your present President. But, sir, in what way have these pledges been kept, and to what extent have you been permitted to keep them?

It is not necessary for my present purpose that I should recall to your notice the operations of the "border ruffians" in Kansas in 1854, when a Delegate was first sent to this House from that Territory, chosen by the votes of some twelve or fourteen hundred non-residents, men who had no better right to vote there than you had; in 1855, when a Legislature was imposed upon that people by citizens of Missouri and other slave States, who, to the number of more than four thousand eight hundred, invaded the Territory of Kansas and claimed and exercised the privilege of voting, and by their votes elected a large majority, if not all, of the members of that body; in 1856, a year stained by the record of crimes and atrocities in that unhappy Territory, so monstrous and so strange that history will set it apart for its bad eminence from all other years in the roll of many centuries. But I will come down to the present year and to what has transpired under the administration of Mr. Buchanan. And, sir, I regret to say that I am compelled to believe that this Administration has never intended that the people of Kansas should be permitted to decide for themselves in respect to the question of slavery. At the same time that I say this, in deepest sorrow and because I must say it if I speak the truth, I rejoice with exceeding joy in the manifestation, in influential quarters, of a fixed and unchangeable purpose to see that what were urged as the true principles of the Nebraska bill shall be respected and carried out at all hazards.

But to return to the Administration. I have said, in effect, that I do not believe that the Administration ever intended that Kansas should be a free State, let the wishes of her people be what they might. And for this belief I am prepared to give my reasons. Men and Governments are to be known by their actions, rather than by their professions. Soon after the inauguration of Mr. Buchanan, the question "who shall hold the offices for and in Kansas?" claimed the attention of the Administration. Governor Geary, who, it was understood, was in favor of popular sovereignty, so called, intimated, it is said, his willingness to continue in office as Governor, if he could be allowed to employ all the proper means necessary to protect the people in the exercise of their rights. But no, this was not to be thought of; and a distinguished gentleman from Mississippi in whom, from his residence in the South, and his known views upon the subject of slavery, it was supposed, no doubt, that full confidence might be reposed by the propagandists, was appointed in the place of Governor Geary. For the subordinate offices in the Territory the most extreme and notorious pro-slavery men were selected—in some instances, men who had been most unscrupulous and violent in their efforts to defeat the popular will; even men who had been the leading spirits in those deeds of inhumanity and blasphemy which made the land shudder, and whose arms were red to the shoulders with the blood of their murdered victims.

It is true, the Administration promised the people of Kansas that they should have an honest vote at their elections. How was this promise fulfilled? To say nothing of the election of members of the constitutional convention, to which I shall have occasion to allude hereafter, let me call your attention to the election of members of the Territorial Legislature. When it had been demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Governor and Secretary of Kansas that the most palpable and stupid frauds had been perpetrated in McGee and Johnson counties, by which the majority of the Legislature would be given to the slave-State men—frauds so patent that the President himself did not doubt their existence, and the Governor and Secretary, as fair men, could not help rejecting the votes returned through these frauds, whereby the free-State men were placed in the majority in the Legislature—what did the President do? Approve and commend the course of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton in performing their duty, and seeing that the rights of the people to govern themselves, so far as delegated by the organic act, were not destroyed by fraud? No; but if all rumor be correct, he had for them nothing but frowns and reproaches. Now, if Governor Walker had been more faithful to the Administration, and less true to the people and his own promises, and had given certificates to the pro-slavery claimants in Johnson and McGee, it would not have been difficult, under the forms and pretenses of an adherence to the doctrine of popular sovereignty, to have brought Kansas into the Union as a slave State. But when this election was lost all was lost, and the pretexts even of popular sovereignty were as good as dismissed forever.

Now come to a consideration of the Lecompton constitution and the President's message. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress may admit new States into the Union. The very language used implies the exercise of a discretion in Congress; it ought to be, no doubt, a wise, honest, just discretion. I do not understand from the Constitution, or from the practice of Congress, that any particular form of application is necessary. Whenever the judgments and consciences of Senators and Representatives are satisfied that the people of a Territory having a sufficient population desire to be admitted into the Union as a State, and they present themselves with a constitution providing for a republican form of government, and which does no injustice to other States, which contains nothing immoral, indecent, or greatly wrong, it is the duty of Congress to grant the prayer of their petition. But if the constitution presented does not provide for a republican form of government; if it contains provisions which are manifestly unjust to other States; if its provisions are indecent and immoral, although they may not be regarded as strictly inconsistent with the idea of a republican form of government; or if the members of Congress believe, and from the evidence must believe, that it is not in accordance with the wishes of a majority of the people; if they know, as well as anything of the kind can be known, that the majority of the people are opposed to it and would vote against it if they had a chance, it is their duty to vote against the admission of a State with such a constitution and under such circumstances. I should do it. I will not vote to drag a people into the Union against their will, if I know their will, and under a constitution which is not theirs. I have no right to do so. In thus voting I would abuse the power vested in me as much as I should if I were to vote against the admission of a State which should present a petition for admission accompanied by a just and republican constitution, and should have the best reason to know that it was the wish of the great majority of the people that she should be admitted.

I shall not look to forms and technicalities, but to the substance, in such cases. I would not consider an enabling act by Congress, or an act of the Territorial Legislature, necessary in any case to authorize the people to ask for admission as a State. Should a Territory having the requisite population desire admission as a State, and a respectable number of her citizens issue a call for an election at which the judgment of the people could be taken whether they would have a State government, and it should be made to appear to my mind that a majority of the people desired the formation of such a government, and should these people provide for an election of delegates to a convention to form a constitution, and elections be held under such call, and the people vote thereat and elect delegates, and these meet in convention and frame a proper and republican constitution, and submit it to the people, by a clear majority of whom it should be ratified, and I should perceive that all things were done honestly and in good faith, can there be the slightest doubt that it would be both my right and duty, under such circumstances, to vote for her admission as a State? On the other hand, if a constitution should be sent here under the authority of forty enabling acts or territorial acts, and the evidence should be of such character as to enforce the conviction that the people had never made that constitution nor asked for admission under it; that it had been carried by fraud and violence over their heads, and was sent here, that a government might be made for them which they would abhor and detest, I would have no right to vote for the admission, and no power on earth should compel me to vote for it. How poor and pitiful is all the talk about records and enabling acts, and territorial acts, and proceedings regular in form, and legal bodies, when you know in your heart what the people want and what they do not want, and are required to act under a constitution which clothes you with a discretion in just such cases, and calls upon you to exercise it wisely and honestly!

And now, sir, how is it with this Lecompton constitution? Let us see whether, in the action of the convention which formed it, and of the President subsequent to its formation, we have no evidence in confirmation of the opinion I have had the honor to express in respect to the designs of the Federal Executive; and also let us observe how sadly the expectations of the real friends of popular sovereignty must have been disappointed in the Administration, which could not have had an existence but for their almost superhuman exertions.

Let us consider, in the first place, as to the constitution of this Lecompton convention. The President and his friends contend that it was fairly constituted, and fairly represents the people, and the whole power residing in the people; and, therefore, that it was unnecessary to submit their work—to wit, the constitution which they had framed—to them for their ratification or rejection. He says the law for its constitution "was, in the main, fair and just; and it is to be regretted that all the qualified electors had not registered themselves, and voted under its provisions."

Sir, what are the facts? In answer to this question I will produce no uncertain testimony; and, in the main, will rely upon witnesses whom the President is estopped from impeaching, and whose testimony was in his possession when he made the statement which I have quoted. Let us see what Governor Walker says upon this point in his recent letter to the President:

"That [the Lecompton] convention had vital, not technical defects, in the very substance of its organization under the territorial law, which could only be cured, in my judgment—as set forth in my inaugural and other addresses—by the submission of the constitution for ratification or rejection by the people. On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken and the voters registered; and when this was completed, the delegates to the convention should be appointed accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters.

"These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties in the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give, a solitary vote for delegates to the convention."

"Nor could it be said these counties acquiesced; for, wherever they endeavored by a subsequent census or registry of their own to supply this defect, occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention."

"I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four, there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry; and not a solitary vote was given or could be given for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties." Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters in Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent."

The failure to vote, says Governor Walker, who knows what he says, and proves it, was "no fault of their own." Again, in fifteen counties not a "solitary vote could be given;" yet the President regrets that the qualified voters had not registered themselves and voted!

Upon this point Secretary Stanton, who is no free-State man or Republican, but a pro-slavery Democrat, as he himself has told us, says:

"The census therein provided for was imperfectly obtained from an unwilling people in nineteen counties of the Territory; while in the remaining counties, being also nineteen in number, from various causes, no attempt was made to comply with the law. In some instances, people and officers were alike averse to the proceedings; in others, the officers neglected or refused to act; and in some, there was but a small population and no efficient organization, enabling the people to secure a representation in the convention."

There was no remedy whatever for these men who had not been registered, as was proved by actual trial. The case is not left to conjecture, but stands on evidence; and here it is, in the memorial and protest of the people of Anderson county, Kansas. I beg you will all read it; and when you have done so, turn to the President's message, and examine again the clause which I have just read to you:

MEMORIAL AND PROTEST FROM KANSAS.

To the Senate and House of Representatives, in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of Anderson county, Territory of Kansas, would most respectfully submit the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted at a mass convention of the citizens of our county, held at Hyatt, September 15, 1857:

"Whereas, the example of our forefathers has taught us to resist every attempt which may be made to disfranchise us as citizens; and whereas, the districting and apportionment for members of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas shows an unquestionable determination to deprive us of our rights as citizens, in that it provides no representation in either branch of the Legislature in sixteen counties, containing nearly half the population of the Territory—thus placing us in the position of the patriots of the Revolution, who were taxed and refused representation; and whereas, the course pursued by the constitutional convention, at its session at Lecompton last week, in regard to the members elected to represent this county in that convention, indicates that we are not to be allowed a representation in that body, or a voice in regard to its actions: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we, the citizens of Anderson county, approve of the course pursued by the two delegates from our county, in their demand for the return of their certificates from the constitutional convention; and that we protest against the acts of said convention, which we consider to be a denial of our right to be represented, and illegal, on the ground that this and other counties are not represented."

Your petitioners would also present the following, which was unanimously adopted by a convention of delegates representing nineteen counties of the Territory of Kansas, held at the Sac and Fox agency, in said Territory:

"Whereas the apportionment law of the territorial government of Kansas is unjust and unequal, as it nearly disfranchises one half of the population of the Territory of Kansas, giving to nineteen counties only three representatives; and whereas we, the delegates of the said nineteen counties, feel that we have rights equal to our population, and are therefore entitled to a full representation: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we, in behalf of our constituents, protest against the unequal representation awarded to us."

Your petitioners would most respectfully represent that the law of the Legislature of Kansas, "to provide for the taking of a census and the election of delegates to a convention," required—

"Sec. 1. That it shall be the duty of the sheriff of the several counties in Kansas Territory, and they are hereby required, between the 1st day of March and the 1st day of April, 1857, to make an enumeration of all free male inhabitants, citizens of the United States, over twenty-one years of age, and all other white persons actually residing within their respective counties."

Section two provides: "In the case of any vacancy in the office of sheriff, the duties imposed upon such sheriff by this act shall devolve upon and be performed by the judge of the probate court of the county in which such vacancy may exist." And it further provides: "In case the office of both sheriff and probate judge shall be or become vacant, the Governor shall appoint some competent resident of such county to perform such duty."

Section three provides that "the sheriff, probate judge, or person appointed by the Governor, shall file in the office of the probate judge a full list of the legal voters in the county, previous to the 10th day of April, 1857."

Section seven provides that "it shall be the duty of the Governor and Secretary of the Territory, so soon as the census shall be completed and returns made, to proceed to an apportionment of the members for a convention among the different counties and election districts of the Territory."

Your petitioners would most respectfully represent, that "there was no sheriff in this county, from the time of the passage of the census act until the 10th day of April last, the time specified by the law for making the return; and that there was a judge of the probate court, but, from some cause, this officer made no effort to take the census; and that, after the expiration of the time prescribed by law, in the absence of the judge of the probate court, John McDaniel took the census, and returned the same to the executive office." (See report of the committee of convention.)

Your petitioners would further represent, that (in violation of the laws which provided that the apportionment should be made by the Governor and Secretary of the Territory, "so soon as the census shall be completed and the returns made,") the apportionment was made previous, and that this (the county of Anderson) and other counties of Kansas Territory have thereby been excluded from a representation in that convention.

Your petitioners would further represent, that, by extra-official authority from Governor Walker to the judge of Anderson county, after the appointment for delegates was made, an election was held, and Dr. R. Gilpatrick and J. Y. Campbell were elected to represent our county in said convention; and it will appear, from the facts admitted in both reports of the committee of that convention, that we, "the people of Anderson county, are in no way responsible for the failure of being represented in the convention, under our conformity to the Kansas statutes."

Your petitioners would further represent, that the convention assembled at Lecompton, to frame a State constitution, is not a convention of the representatives of the people of Kansas, in that the representatives of this county have not been allowed a seat in said convention, and also that, by an illegal apportionment, other counties have been entirely disfranchised.

Your petitioners would, therefore, most respectfully protest against the adoption of any constitution or act by Congress which may be framed or enacted by said convention. And your petitioners would most humbly pray the Congress of the United States to reject the acts of said convention, and to adopt such laws and measures as they may deem advisable, in order that every bona fide citizen, and every county in the Territory of Kansas, may have a voice in the creation of the State constitution under which they are to live, and by which they are to be governed. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Signed by

W. F. M. ARMY,
R. GILPATRICK,
JAMES Y. CAMPBELL,

And about two hundred other voters of Anderson county, Kansas.

Thus it appears conclusively, and from authority which cannot be disputed, that the people of fifteen of the thirty-four counties in the Territory were not and could not be represented in this convention. Nearly one half of the people of the Territory were deprived of the right of being heard in the choice of delegates who were to exercise the highest powers of sovereignty. In one county, it has been seen, in which there was no registry, the people did all they could to be represented in the convention. They held a meeting at which they voted and elected delegates. That these delegates were the choice of the people of the county, and were elected with as much regularity as the circumstances of the case would permit, and that the county was entitled by its population to two delegates, are facts which do not seem to have been disputed. Yet these delegates were not received. If they had been, the whole action of the convention might have been reversed. The constitution was adopted, if I am not misinformed, by a majority of only two votes. If the Anderson delegates, who would have represented as many of the people of Kansas as any two members of the convention, had been allowed to vote, the constitution would have been rejected. They were not permitted to vote; the constitution was adopted, and is claimed to be the sovereign act of the people! It was no such thing. The Lecompton convention did not represent the sovereignty of the people, for it did not emanate from the people; therefore the constitution should have been submitted to them in such manner that, if they did not want it, they could reject it.

But this has not been done. Let us place ourselves where the people of Kansas were on the 21st day of December, and we shall find that they cannot vote upon the constitution made by that convention at all. Nine out of every ten of them may dislike it; they may object seriously, and upon principle, to many of its provisions; they may not like the power to establish a mammoth bank; or they may wish to reserve to the Legislature the power to grant divorces, although I think they would be unwise to do so; but it is their business, and they have a right to be heard on it; they may object to give to Johnson county, with four hundred voters, as large a representation in the Senate as is allotted to Douglas county, with two thousand; they may desire to be permitted to vote for an adopted citizen for Governor, although he may not have been naturalized for the full term of twenty years. But, under the Lecompton schedule, they have no opportunity to vote on any of these questions, or to say, that rather than have the constitution as it is, they will have none. The convention only permits them to say whether slaves may hereafter be taken into the State or not.

The President and his friends in the Senate, Mr. BIGLER and Mr. FRENCH, admit that it was indispensable that the question of slavery should be submitted to the people. But even this was not done. The people are not to say whether they will have slavery or not, but only in what way they will have it; only in reference to the future sources of supply; or, in other words, they are to be allowed to say whether or not they will give to the business of slave breeding, within the State, the advantage of absolute protection against foreign competition. Men must vote a falsehood if they vote at all; for "constitution with no slavery" is slavery to all intents and purposes. Vote any way the people can, and slavery is fixed in the State, and forever, or until the constitution shall be overthrown by a revolution. The increase of the slaves in Kansas is protected by the "constitution with no slavery," and there is no provision by which, under the constitution, any changes can be made, hereafter, to affect the condition of the slaves now within the Territory, and their descendants. Not only till 1864, but to the end of time, is the existence of slavery secured by this constitution. Though the "constitution with no slavery" be adopted, it will be with the condition "that the right of property in slaves, now in this Territory, shall in no manner be interfered with;" and as it respects the future, under this constitution, it is provided that, after 1864, when the constitution may be altered in all other respects, "no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves." Thus the people are to be bound, hand and foot, and a few interlopers and miscreants, assembled at Lecompton, in 1857, will control the millions of people who are to inhabit that broad and beautiful land, for ages and ages.

And this is Democracy; the democracy of slavery! This kind of democracy—not that of Washington and Jefferson—is fast disappearing from our section of the country. Men in the free North cannot stand it. They are so much alarmed by its doctrines that they will not only repudiate it for the present and future, but be anxious to prove that they never had anything to do with it their lives long. This democracy of slavery will hereafter be in use only as a warning or a fright, and will operate as effectually to preserve our public domain against the ravages of slavery as the scare-crow set up last summer by one of our down-east farmers did, to protect his cornfield against the depredations of the crows. It was so hideous and terrible, that it not only kept the crows off this year, but frightened them so badly that they brought back the corn they stole last year.

Sir, the "constitution with no slavery" is held by those who ought to know to be the best form of a pro-slavery constitution. See what is said by a correspondent of the Jackson Mississippian, writing from Lecompton, on the 27th of November last:

"Thus you see that whilst, by submitting the question in this form, they are bound to have a ratification of the one or the other, and that while it seems to be an election between a free-State and pro-slavery constitution, it is in fact but a question of the future introduction of slavery that is in controversy; and yet it furnishes our friends in Congress a basis on which to rest their vindication of the admission of Kansas as a State under it into the Union; while they would not have it, sent directly from the convention.

"It is the very best proposition for making Kansas a slave State that was submitted for the consideration of the convention. In addition to what I have stated, it embraces a provision continuing in force all existing laws of the Territory until repealed by the Legislature of the State to be elected under the provisions of this constitution."

The Charleston Mercury entertains similar opinions, as will be seen by the following:

"We are equally satisfied with the action of the convention. We differ, too, with the President as to what is submitted to the vote of the people. We do not think that the question of slavery or no slavery is submitted to the vote of the people. Whether the clause in the constitution is voted out or voted in, slavery exists and has a guaranty in the constitution that it shall not be interfered with; whilst, if the slavery party in Kansas can keep or get the majority of the Legislature, they may open wide the door for the immigration of slaves. But this, also, is a small matter of difference with the President."

It is said that the constitution, in whatever form it may be adopted, can be changed by the people at any time; but this is a mistake. It cannot be changed in any respect until after 1864, and even then in no way affecting the rights of property in slaves. But were it otherwise, and the people were authorized to change it after 1864 in all respects, what sort of a prospect would there be before them? That you may see what the more conservative of the Kansas people think about it, I will read from a recent article in the Herald of Freedom, a paper friendly to Governor Walker:

"Should we be so unfortunate as to be admitted into the Union under that instrument, what then are our chances for getting out of the dilemma? Can we throw off the yoke by revolution? We can try, and, possibly, can triumph. It is possible, too, that we may be defeated, as Federal bayonets, as was the case in Rhode Island, will be at the service of the government recognized by Congress.

"If we are admitted into the Union under that bogus constitution, and Federal troops are used to sustain it, and the people are defeated, what then are our prospects? Let us examine.

"We have then a pro-slavery constitution, in the hands of pro-slavery officers, with every avenue for the people to change that government closed against us. Every officer of the government is out of our hands, and beyond our reach. The Governor and Lieutenant Governor will hold their office two years; the members of the House of Representatives two years; and of the Senate, four years; the judiciary for six years; and so on to the end. The constitution cannot be amended until after 1864. Then it will require at least three years to amend it, which will carry us forward ten years from this time.

"With the whole thing in the hands of the scoundrels who managed the Oxford and McGee frauds, when have we more hopes of success than now?

"If that constitution is adopted by Congress, and the officers are in the hands of the pro-slavery party, then thousands of that party, with their negroes, will pour into Kansas next spring, and they will completely inundate it, like the frogs and lice of Egypt. It will be a slave State forever, and we have not the power to prevent it. The free-State residents, conscious of the withering effects of slavery, will gradually withdraw from the Territory, and the end is only seen with the accursed institution spreading itself, like a malarial, over the entire West. The arm of slavery, strengthened in the United States Senate, will not relax its efforts. On the contrary, it will grow stronger and stronger as years roll on, and gather strength as new slave States are carved out of that region lying around the base of the Rocky Mountains, and in the basin west of it, extending to the shores of the Pacific."

Not only are the people of the Territory deprived of the right of voting against the constitution and defeating it altogether; not only are they denied the privilege of voting for a constitution which prohibits slavery, but the free-State men, who are admitted to compose an overwhelming majority, have no opportunity allowed them to choose between the two pro-slavery forms which were submitted. Their right even to make this choice is dependent on the performance of a condition which, it must have been well known, they cannot do otherwise than reject.

Section nine of the schedule provides as follows:

"Any person offering to vote at the aforesaid election upon said constitution shall, if challenged, take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and to support this constitution if adopted, under the penalties of perjury under the territorial laws."

Now, sir, under this schedule, the voter knows, when he offers his ballot, that the constitution with slavery may be adopted. He not only has the right to assume, but he does and must assume, that it will be. In this case may is equivalent to must. He must be prepared to say and swear that he will support the constitution in whichever of the two forms proposed it may be adopted. Suppose it to be accepted "with slavery"—as in fact it has been—and one of its sections will read in these words:

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable, as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

Thus the citizen who offers his ballot may be required, before he can deposit it, to swear that he will support and maintain, as a great fundamental truth, as one of the axioms of government, the proposition that the right to hold human beings in slavery, and treat them as dumb, driven cattle, is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; or, in other words, is founded in absolute and eternal justice. All this he must swear, or he cannot vote. It is not enough that he should make oath that he is of lawful age; that he is an American citizen; that he has been a resident of the Territory the term required by law, and is in all respects a qualified voter; but he is esteemed unfit to vote concerning the institutions under which he is to live, unless he will recognize, by an appeal to the God of truth, the baldest, bitterest lie that ever blistered human lips.

Speaking of this system, General Cass said, in his Nebraska speech:

"Slavery is, in my opinion, as I have said more than once before in the Senate, and I have no doubt unacceptably to many, a great evil, social and political."

Henry Clay declared that it could never be defended "so long as the light of reason and the love of liberty remained among men." To the mind of Daniel Webster it was a thing "accursed." Thomas Jefferson denounced the traffic upon which it was founded as "PIRACY" and "THE OPPROBRIUM OF INFIDEL POWERS." Lord Brougham has characterized its fundamental idea as a "wild and guilty fantasy." John Wesley pronounced it "the sum of all villainies." The great master of the drama, who understood so well all the sides and relations of human life, to whose marvelous insight nothing concerning man was impenetrable, speaks of it as "a curse," and as feeding its victims with "distressful bread;" and our blessed Lord and Savior has condemned it in all the lessons of His life, not less than in the memorable words, "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." But now, in the last half of the nineteenth century, in free democratic America, the people are not to be intrusted with the exercise of one of their dearest rights, until they declare that they will maintain, protect, and uphold this system as founded in natural right, so HELP THEM GOD!

And, sir, the free-State men of Kansas must have foreseen that in any possible event, whether they should attempt to vote or not, a majority of the votes were to be counted and returned for the pro-slavery side. They knew that the men who had counted twelve hundred votes in Oxford precinct, would be ready to do it again if necessary. They saw that the Army, whose protection had been refused them when they had needed it, would be employed to protect voters from abroad, if required. And the event has justified their anticipations. Thirteen hundred votes were given in Oxford, not one hundred of which can be legal; but they are to be considered legal, and no evidence will be permitted to affect their reception. President Pierce in his special message of January 24, 1856, told the free-State men, "it is not the duty of the President of the United States to volunteer interposition by force to preserve the purity of elections either in a State or Territory. To do so, would be subversive of public freedom." Oh, no! the Army may not be used to protect the actual residents and legal voters in 1855 and 1856, who are for free Kansas; but is to be paraded around the polls and the avenues thereto in 1857, to guard the Missourians, who have come over to the Territory on the neighborly errand of voting a constitution for its people, which establishes slavery as an unchangeable system among them.

Mr. Chairman, the "constitution with slavery" was accepted on the 21st of December, by the vote of a meager minority of the actual residents of Kansas. It is to be the organic, fundamental law of that State, unchangeable forever in respect to slavery, as appears from a provision which I have already cited, and will here read again—it is in the section (fourteen) of the schedule which refers to the future amendment of the constitution, and is as follows: "But no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves." In no way but by revolution can a change be effected in the slavery provisions of this constitution; and should a movement of this kind be resorted to by four fifths of the people, the President stands ready with the Army of the United States to crush it and those who participate in it.

That the people might have voted on the 21st of December, and prevented the adoption of this constitution, is, as I have shown, a palpable and vital error. But, let me repeat, the free-State men, who are admitted on all hands, even by Calhoun and the border ruffians, to be largely in the majority, were excluded from the ballot-box by the oath which I have read; for they could not take that oath and be free-State men. But if no such oath had been interposed, how would the case have stood? The election was under the entire control of the architects of the Oxford and McGee frauds, and those who had procured or connived at the voting of Missourians in previous elections; and the Administration at Washington had, by its rebuke of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, for their rejection of false and fraudulent returns, intimidated, in the most unequivocal manner, that any measures necessary to carry the points of the propagandists would be approved, or, at least, winked at. And besides, even if the election had been committed to the supervision of just and impartial men, who would have received and counted all legal votes and no others, there would, nevertheless, have been no opportunity for a vote against the constitution, nor whether slavery should or should not exist in the new State. The people were only permitted to say from what sources the future supplies of slaves should be derived.

Sir, with this plain and truthful statement, which defies contradiction, what an insult to the intelligence of this country, what a cruel mockery to the abused people of Kansas, for the President and his masters to declare that the responsibility of making Kansas a slave State, rests with the free-State men of that Territory.

Mr. Chairman, God lives and reigns; and the days of this madness of injustice are numbered. Within ten years of the nineteenth century has been crowded a history whose like may never be seen again beneath the sun—every perilous step in which, every fearful middle passage, was necessary to the conducting of this people through the dark valleys and the bitter waters of barbarism and bondage, to the broad table lands of civilization and liberty to which the genius of American Democracy is beckoning them, and will surely lead them. Though they may not be reached this year or the next, let us not despair; but continue our labors in courage and in faith to the end, which cannot be afar off. Courage and faith, Republicans! Remember the powers that work with you, and that

"Your friends are exultations, agonies,
And love, and man's unconquerable mind."

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. GROESBECK obtained the floor.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the gentleman from Ohio does not wish to go on this afternoon, I desire, with his permission, to occupy the floor for a moment or two.

Mr. GROESBECK yielded the floor.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not propose to discuss the questions which seem to be relevant to the proposition now before this body; but I desire to avail myself of this occasion to make an appeal to the House in behalf of the interests of the country, or at least, that portion of those interests which is, in part, committed to my care.

The committee must be aware, sir, that all the standing committees of this House have now been organized and ready to proceed with the transaction of business for nearly one month, and that they are unable to proceed with the consideration of a single one of those great measures of national policy which are at this time so urgently demanding the attention of this body.

Now, sir, debate such as we have had for the last two or three days, in the absence of all official information upon the points which have been under discussion, might, under ordinary circumstances, not materially impede the public business of the country; but at this time, as every gentleman must be aware, every hour consumed in this discussion is not only time thrown away, but the waste of that time tends to impede the public business. Take, for example, the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I have the honor to be a member. The committee must be aware that one of our Territories is in a condition of armed rebellion against the Government. The Administration being ignorant of the extent of the hostile and treasonable designs of the people of that Territory, but a comparatively small force was sent out there, and it is now locked up in the mountains, incapable of reaching the seat of the rebellion, or of encountering the legions that those rebels are prepared to pour down upon it. The President of the United States has called upon Congress for an additional force of four regiments. Those regiments ought to be created by law, and organized, if Congress intends to do it at all, in this month of January, otherwise it will be impossible to have them filled and prepared for action by the month of May. And yet, sir, the Committee on Military Affairs has no power or authority to act upon that important measure, thus demanded by the exigencies of the country, because of this debate. This debate stands in the way of the whole business of the country.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him in one respect?

Mr. FAULKNER. I have but a few more remarks to make.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I merely desire to propound this interrogatory to the gentleman: whether history does not show that in past Congresses the President's message has not always been referred? I can show the gentleman by the history of past Congresses, that I can have the floor to-day upon the President's message of 1838. [Laughter.]

Mr. FAULKNER. Well, I do not know what may have been the case in past Congresses; but it is certainly the rule of this body, with which the gentleman from Ohio is well acquainted, that a committee has no power to originate matters of legislation that have not been referred to it; and unless the reference is made, I ask how the committees can act?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not design to arrest discussion. All this discussion can proceed when the President's message comes in on Monday, or at other opportune times. But I say that the effect of prolonging this discussion now, is to impede business, notwithstanding the fact stated by the gentleman from Ohio, that these measures might possibly be got before the committees in some other mode. It is by the reference of the President's message to the various committees of this body that the subjects of legislation are properly placed before those committees for action.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will explain, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not wish any explanation.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I said what I did to show that the action of the committees cannot be delayed by this discussion. All these subjects are before the committees. It has been the uniform practice for the committees to act on the matters embraced in the message without any special reference of those matters to them.

Mr. FAULKNER. That manifestly cannot be the case, because, by the rules of the House which every gentleman here has read, committees are forbidden to act on any subject which has not been referred to them by the House. How, then, I ask, can the Committee on Military Affairs act upon this important subject of the organization of four additional regiments for Utah in the absence of any reference of the subject to them? We meet regularly twice a week; but we have no business before us, and the other committees are in the same position.

I hope, therefore, that in consideration of the public interests, the House will arrest the debate at this stage of the proceedings and permit the reference of all these subjects to the respective committees, and then, when the President's message comes in, this subject will be legitimately before us for discussion, and will not interfere with and frustrate the necessary legislation. And now, sir, with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. PHELPS] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I offer the usual resolution to close debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's annual message in thirty minutes after the committee shall again resume its consideration.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROESBECK] is entitled to one hour.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I was not aware of that fact. I will modify the resolution so as to make it read in one hour instead of thirty minutes; and I demand the previous question.

Mr. GROW. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If we adjourn now, will the resolution come up the first thing on Monday morning?

Mr. GROW. Certainly it will.

Mr. HICKMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HICKMAN and BLISS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 47.

So the motion was agreed to, and the House accordingly (at four o'clock) adjourned until Monday next, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

Monday, January 11, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. A. G. CAROTHERS.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

He also presented the memorial of William D. Moseley, praying to be released from a contract for furnishing live-oak for a sloop-of-war, assumed by him as surety, but which he is unable to complete; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented additional papers in relation to the claim of George Phelps; which, with his petition on file, were referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of the State Agricultural Society of Michigan, praying for a liberal donation of public lands for the promotion of agricultural education in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that bounty land may be granted to those who did military duty during the disturbance on the Canada frontier, known as "the Patriot War," in the year 1838; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Jervis M. Barker; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Edward

P. Vollum, an assistant surgeon in the Army, praying for remuneration for losses in consequence of shipwreck while traveling under orders; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

LAND OFFICES IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. JONES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of establishing two additional land offices in the Territory of Nebraska; one in the Platte valley, west of the guide meridian, and one at or near the mouth of the Platte qui Court, or Neobrarah river.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to the Senate the amount of revenue collected in each collection district, for each of the years from 1852 to 1857 inclusive, the amount expended, and the number of persons employed in each district in the collection of the revenue for each of those years.

MAILS TO SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. BIGLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post

Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing mail lines between the United States, the Empire of Brazil, and the Republics of South America; and also into the best mode of establishing and maintaining such mail facilities, if found necessary and expedient.

RED RIVER RAFT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for completing the removal of the raft of Red river, agreeably to the estimates furnished to the War Department by the engineer in charge of the work; and that the committee be further instructed to report as early as practicable, by bill or otherwise.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred papers in relation to the claim of William B. Trotter, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 52) for the relief of William B. Trotter. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the petition and papers of Amos and John E. Kendall, to ask to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Court of Claims.

The papers have been withdrawn from the Court of Claims and referred to the committee—I think probably under some misapprehension of the facts. I consider that the point involved is one eminently proper for the consideration of the Court of Claims, being simply a legal question as to the liability of the United States on a state of facts which is undisputed. I move that the papers be referred to the Court of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPITOL EXTENSION.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who were instructed to report a plan of assigning the rooms in the north wing of the Capitol extension, appropriated to the use of the Senate, have instructed me to make a report that they have discharged the duties assigned to them—appropriating the rooms to the committees, and for other public uses, according to the plan annexed, which the committee present with their report. I ask that the report be read.

The Secretary read the report.

Mr. HUNTER. I suppose it is not proposed to take any action on that report as yet. Let it lie on the table for the present.

Mr. DAVIS. The committee felt, in discharging the duty, that it was one in which it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to give entire satisfaction; and therefore of course we do not press it to an adoption now. If the Senate choose to lay it on the table in order that it may be examined, of course we have no objection.

The report was laid on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 53) for the relief of John McVey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 54) to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of John Donnelson, Stephen Heard, and others," approved May 24, 1824; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOUSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 6) to extend to the naval retiring board an opportunity of enjoying the same advantages as were enjoyed by officers who have been dropped, furloughed, and retired by said board; which was read, and passed to a second reading, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HUNTER was, on his motion, excused from service on the Committee on the Library.

Mr. EVANS. I ask to be excused from service upon the Committee on Naval Affairs. I am already on three committees, and I believe I was only put on the Naval Committee as a sort of locum tenens until my colleague's arrival.

The request was granted; and on motion of Mr. HUNTER, and by unanimous consent, the Vice President was authorized to fill the vacancies. The vacancy on the Naval Committee was filled by the appointment of Mr. HAMMOND.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

The VICE PRESIDENT, at one o'clock, announced that the hour had arrived for the consideration of the special order, being the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to refer so much of the President's annual message as relates to the affairs of Kansas, to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BROWN. I believe I was entitled to the floor on the special order, but I have no disposition to pursue the debate now. It has manifestly lost a great part of its vitality. The question itself is undergoing important changes, presenting new phases every day; and in view of the probability, the almost absolute certainty, that it is to be presented to us in a new, more active, and more vital form in the course of a few days, I shall prefer withholding what I have to say until the question shall be before us in some practical form.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the message be referred, and let remarks be made afterwards, when the Senate has before it some practical issue.

Mr. BROWN. So far as I am concerned, unless some other Senator is desirous of pursuing the debate, I propose to let the matter go off for the present.

Mr. CLAY and others. Let it be referred.

Mr. HALE. I desire to address the Senate on the subject, but I am not prepared to do so at this moment.

Several SENATORS. Postpone it.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone it until Thursday.

Mr. GWIN. Say Monday.

Mr. HALE. I have no particular objection. I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Monday, at one o'clock, and make it the special order for that time.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 3) to extend and define the authority of the President under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'an act to promote the efficiency of the Navy'" in respect to dropped and retired naval officers, reported it with an amendment.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that in any case where the records of the courts of inquiry appointed under the act of January 16, 1857, may render it advisable, in the opinion of the President of the United States, to restore to the active or reserved list of the Navy, or to transfer from furlough to leave of absence on the latter list, any officer who may have been dropped or retired by the operation of the act of February 23, 1855, entitled "An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy," he shall have authority, notwithstanding any existing law to the contrary, to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint such officer to the active or reserved list; and officers, so nominated and confirmed, are to occupy positions on the active and reserved lists, respectively, according to rank and seniority when dropped or retired, and be entitled to all the benefits conferred by the act of January 16, 1857, on officers restored or transferred to the active or reserved list under that act.

The amendment of the committee is to insert at the end of the joint resolution—

Provided, That the President of the United States may, whenever the public interests may, in his judgment, require it, transfer any officer from the leave list to the furlough list of the Navy.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope that some action will be taken by the Senate on this subject at an early day. The whole scope of the resolution is to give the President power, when in his discretion the records of the courts of inquiry justify a nomination to the Senate, to make it. As the law now stands, if an officer has been retired on leave or on furlough, or if he has been dropped, and the President, on reviewing the record of the court of inquiry, should disapprove the finding of the court, the officer is left in the condition in which the board placed him. In other words, it deprives the President of any power to remedy any injustice or evil which he may find to have been inflicted on an officer, both by the board and by the court. Moreover, it places the President and the Senate in a condition subordinate to the court of inquiry, binding his action and the subject on which the Senate can take action, so as to be controlled by the finding of a court of inquiry. I think this is all wrong, reversing the natural order of things, and I merely propose to enlarge the power of the President to the extent of his constitutional prerogative. I hope there will be no difficulty in passing the resolution.

Mr. STUART. I think that the President of the United States possesses all the power which it is proposed to confer upon him by this resolution; and my objection is to assuming by this species of legislation that he has not the power. I hold that the President can nominate to office any person he chooses, and it is not within the power of Congress to limit that constitutional right. I know, sir, that in the law referred to by the Senator from Mississippi, there is an apparent limitation of the power. That law did not receive my vote. I could not, even by implication, consent to yield the point that the President, in the exercise of his constitutional power to nominate, can be limited by any law of Congress.

While these are my views, and constitute with me a very serious, and, I may say, insurmountable objection to voting for any proposition of this kind, I desire to do no more than express my sentiments. If the Senate choose to pass any proposition of this description, I do not wish to oppose its passage; but I simply suggest that I think the more we legislate on this subject in this way, the greater will be the number of difficulties we shall accumulate.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish merely to say to the Senate, in connection with the question of power, that whatever may be the fact, in the particular case, special legislation seems to have been directed against the exercise of that power by the Executive. I may also say, on the authority of what I find in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, that neither the President nor the Secretary of the Navy considers himself authorized to nominate otherwise than as provided in the special act of the last session. Nor do I concur with the Senator from Michigan, that it is not within the power of legislation to limit the prerogative of the President in nominating to the Senate. We enter into a contract—not in form, but in substance—with every one who enters either branch of the military service. Promotion is his right, with certain reservations; and I hold that the Executive, notwithstanding the general language of the Constitution, has not the power to go over the head of every officer that has won his promotion, up to the rank of commander, for instance, and seek in civil life for some one whom he will nominate to the Senate for a captain of the Navy. It would be a violation of the solemn understanding made with gentlemen who have served the country—a violation of a vested right which they possess.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the gentleman indulge me for a moment? I think there should be some limitation on the time of exercising this power. The resolution contains no such limitation.

Mr. DAVIS. The limitation of time, I thought, was found in the existing law, which is so narrow that a proposition has been made to extend it. I have no objection, however, to any limitation being put on this proposition which the Senator from Vermont may think proper to suggest. My object is not to extend the time, but merely to extend the power.

I was going to merely add to the remarks which I made, that I do not think the President can, in violation of law, and in violation of an implied contract with the officers of the Navy, nominate from civil life some one who shall outrank those who have by faithful service attained their grade. Promotion attaches to them as a part of the contract; and if the President were to nominate a person from civil life, I trust we shall never have a Senate that will confirm him, in total disregard of the dear-bought rights of officers of the military service, in either of its branches.

I stated, when I was first up, that I looked upon this resolution as merely conferring on the President the power to do that which the law never should have taken from him. I agree with the Senator from Michigan that this legislation has been unfortunate. I think the whole proceeding has been unfortunate. I wish now, however, to remedy an evil which I think is palpable. Because legislation has been bad heretofore, it does not follow that we should remedy none of the evils growing out of that bad legislation. We must advance; and if that advance be the result of our having previously taken a wrong step, the fact that we have erred in the past surely should not limit our action in the future. I hope that the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Mississippi, with reference to a point which was started by the Senator from Michigan. In case an officer has been court-martialed, and dismissed from the Navy under sentence of a court-martial, would it not be competent for the President to reappoint him if he saw fit?

Mr. DAVIS. I should think not. I should suppose that if he had lost his commission in the form provided by law, he thereby lost all those rights which appertained to him when in commission; and it would not be in the power of the President to reappoint him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I differ with the Senator from Mississippi in relation to that matter. If the particular place which the officer had lost in consequence of the action of a court-martial were once filled, undoubtedly that officer could not be appointed to it.

Mr. DAVIS. In order that we may not misunderstand each other, I will say to the Senator, that the action of the President, in the case which he supposes, would be rather in the character of a revisory process, and that the President has sometimes exercised. I do not question the authority there; but after the place has been filled, then the appointment of the same man is to my mind in the nature of an original appointment, just as if he were taken from civil life.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no doubt of that. My question was whether he could not make an original appointment, and again appoint the same officer to a place, perhaps of equal rank, unless they take rank according to their commissions in all cases. There is nothing to prevent the President appointing an officer who has been court-martialed and dismissed, although the particular place which he formerly held may have been filled. I do not know how it can be filled again by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by law, unless you provide that he shall take rank above certain men, or rank from such a date. If that is the object, I can see that it may possibly be accomplished in this way.

But, sir, I have the misfortune to differ in opinion on this matter from the Senator from Mississippi. If the power exists, as suggested by the Senator from Michigan, I should be very unwilling that the President should exercise it; and if it does not exist, I should be very unwilling to confer it. When a man has passed through two ordeals of this kind—in the first place having been tried by a commission appointed by Congress for that purpose, and, in their judgment, found unworthy, or unable to discharge his duties; and then, having demanded a trial, and having been tried and heard, and had another decision by his peers, or by those who were constituted to make that decision—I should be very unwilling indeed to confer upon the President the power of revising the whole proceeding, and overruling the decision thus made.

I am inclined to believe with the Senator from Michigan that the power exists; but if it does not exist, I think there is no good reason for extending it. I do not see why we should place it in possession of the President, who is certainly not as able to judge as those who decided this question on evidence, and knowledge of the capacity of these individuals—for he can have no practical acquaintance with them—to discharge the duties of the offices to which he may be asked to appoint them. I therefore upon that principle oppose it.

With regard to the other branch of the subject—the transfer of individuals from the reserved to the furlough list, and from the furlough to the reserved list—that is a matter of pay, which may be regulated by statute, and does not come within the constitutional provision with reference to the appointment of officers. If it is desirable at all to make any such arrangements, the power can only be exercised by the President, in consequence of its having been in the first place conferred upon him by a law of Congress; but even in that case you are putting very much into the power of the President. He is as likely to be misled as other men. Why should he have the power to degrade a man from the reserved to the furlough list, when that man is not in active service, but has been retired from active service in the Navy because he is incompetent, for some reason, to exercise its duties? Why should the President have power to deprive him of a portion of his pay, or to increase it? I believe that the law, and the tribunals appointed to judge in these matters, can decide questions of that description much more wisely. At any rate, I should be very unwilling to run the risk of the errors that even the President might be led into on such subjects.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Maine objects to this proposition, as giving the President power to revise that which he assumes the President does not so well understand as a court of inquiry. That is an objection which goes not only to this special law, but to all laws upon such subjects. The President is now authorized to revise, and is required to approve or disapprove, the decisions of the courts of inquiry. The defect I point out is, that if he disapproves, if he does not concur with the court, no remedy is provided. The court, on a certain record, which the President afterwards examines, or is supposed to examine, adjudges that an officer should be left on the furlough list. The President finds in that record evidence that he should be on the active list; he disapproves the proceeding of the court; but the officer is left, by his disapprobation, just where he would have been if the President had concurred in the finding of the court. This is a great defect in the law. It is withholding justice in the manner in which justice is ordinarily bestowed on individuals who appear before courts, either civil or military. It is exactly to remedy that defect that I have introduced this joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. For the first time, sir, since I have had my attention turned to this subject, I feel a little embarrassed how to proceed. I was not in Congress when the law creating the naval board was passed. As it was passed nearly unanimously, it is barely possible that if I had been here I might have voted for it, though I think it is a violent presumption. I am opposed to it—to the whole of it: its beginning, continuing, and ending. I am opposed to everything that has been done under that bill, and to everybody that did it. I think it was a great mistake, a great error, and a great reproach to the country, to the Navy, to Congress, and to the national character; and, believing so, I feel very much inclined to undo everything they did, so far as I can. I was in favor of the bill passed at the last session; and I understand that something like half, or nearly half, of the officers have been restored by the findings of the courts under it.

The embarrassment under which I find myself at this session, is that the Senate, in its wisdom or its folly, has placed me upon the Committee on Naval Affairs; and I do not feel exactly that liberty which I did when I was an outsider. But, sir, this law, as it now stands, is obnoxious to the charge which the Senator from Mississippi brings against it. If the court find that an officer was unjustly and wrongfully displaced from the Navy by the act of the retiring board, and the President agrees with them in that opinion, then there is redress for those to whom the finding is favorable; but if the court find that a man was rightfully dropped or put on the retired list, and they send their records to the President, (for these courts were obliged to keep records; and the old board did not,) and the President is of opinion that they are entirely wrong, and that the man ought to be restored, he cannot exercise his discretion; he cannot do anything. It thus appears to be the law, that the President may do right in half the cases; and if his opinion is that wrong has been done in the other half, he cannot redress it. This resolution proposes to give him power to do right. It is an enabling act, to enable the President to do right. I think it is a good act. I think we could pass such an act with regard to a great many other matters; and if the President would take advantage of it, good would result. The subject before us now stands in this way: gentlemen were once dismissed without a trial, and without a record; they have since had an open trial before a court authorized to keep a record; and the President is of opinion that, upon that open trial by that record, they ought to be restored, but he cannot restore them. That is all that this resolution proposes to remedy.

An objection is made that the President has this power. The Constitution says that Congress has power "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Under this constitutional grant we have provided that these men shall be dropped. Have we not, by virtue of the same authority, power to say that if the President finds a man who has been dropped by virtue of the law who ought not to have been dropped, he may be restored? Is not that a fair exercise of the power granted by the Constitution to Congress "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces?" For the reasons which I have stated, I am in favor of the resolution; but I confess I do not exactly understand the force of the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I believe that the President has the power without the amendment, but I am not clear about it. I hope this resolution will pass now, because, on the 16th of January, the act of last year expires by its own limitation, and the Naval Committee will have to examine all these cases; and it will be physically impossible for them to examine them before that act expires. Congress—I speak now as a matter of history—have permitted great injustice to be done to these men; and the little measure of justice we can mete out to them can only be meted out by the passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If I agreed with the Senator from New Hampshire in the principle which he assumes as the foundation of all his remarks, perhaps I might come to the same conclusion. I was not opposed to the passage of the act providing for the naval board originally, because I believed that something of the kind was very necessary; and I am not, therefore, opposed to the act itself, and all that has been done under it, and to everybody that has done it. I believe that very much good has been done, because, in my opinion, the Navy needed weeding as much as any other branch of the public service, if not more; and, although it is possible that some injury may have been done under it, Congress has taken care, or has tried to take care, that all the evils thus done shall be remedied.

As I remarked before, there have been two successive trials of these gentlemen. The first was said to be a very imperfect one, and Congress attempted to remedy it. They passed an act by which every man deeming himself aggrieved might apply and have a trial before a tribunal where he could be heard personally, and where he could be heard by counsel; where he could introduce evidence and have the matter decided without favor, or affection, or dislike, or any other feeling which should not enter into the consideration of a question of this description.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator from Maine allow me to ask him a single question: whether, by the law, that court, when organized, would have power to grant a new trial if either of the parties who came before them, for any reason had not a fair trial?

Mr. FESSENDEN. All these courts which have been held have now terminated; the time has gone by. I do not know that there are any complaints that all who applied did not have a perfectly fair opportunity to be heard and to be tried; or that the court, when delay was requested, did not grant it; or that anything else was done, of which any man had a right to complain.

Now, sir, is there never to be an end to this question? These naval gentlemen were before us during the whole of the last Congress demanding redress. Congress took care to give them an opportunity to have their wrongs redressed if they had suffered wrong. We appointed courts of inquiry. There have been no complaints that I have ever heard that these courts were not constituted fairly and honestly, of honorable and impartial men. They have been heard, and the results have been sent to the President. They have restored many; they have changed the positions of others; and they have left some others in the places where the original commission placed them. If the principle upon which Congress acted in the first instance was a correct principle, that such was the situation of the Navy that it was necessary to have a board which should place many of these persons on the retired list or dismiss them, then everything has been fully and fairly done, and consequently there has been at least one fair and impartial trial. What will be the necessary result of passing this resolution? We are to have this matter before us over again; very possibly we are to have it before us on nominations to restore those officers who have been left by the courts, as the commission originally left them, to their old places. What has taken place in the mean time? We have had a large increase of the list of captains of the Navy—larger, I believe, than was allowed by the original law; because the places originally made vacant have been filled, and now many of the officers are restored to their old places, thus increasing the number. If we are to clothe the President with power that he has not at present, the result will be that he will be overborne with applications and remonstrances in regard to the last decisions of the courts; the whole matter will come before him again; influences will be brought to bear on him to procure restorations; and we shall have the two Houses agitated over and over again with the same questions which agitated us during the whole of the last Congress.

Now, sir, I do not believe that because certain officers of the Navy have been retired or placed on what is called the furlough list, and some dismissed, that, therefore, we are to presume that great injustice has been done to those gentlemen. It is very possible that in some individual cases, there may have been an error; but the presumption is in favor of the correctness of the proceeding.

Again, I am indisposed to the increase of Executive power in reference to appointments. As the Constitution is construed and understood, the President has power enough, and I am rather disposed to limit it, if we can limit it, than to increase it. We cannot limit the President's constitutional power, but we can possibly confer more. I am opposed to it, especially in cases where I do not believe he is so well capable of judging as others. Originally he must judge of all nominations to be made. He is the constituted tribunal to settle all these matters in the first place, and must settle them; the responsibility is on him; but after men have been tried by their peers, by individuals acquainted with the duties they have to perform, and necessarily acquainted with their capacity, from evidence and otherwise, to perform those duties, and have decided this question, I do not believe the President is so well able to judge of the testimony, or so competent to overrule their decisions as they are to make them in the first instance. The answer which the honorable Senator from Mississippi made me, though it exhibits very clearly what his design is, he will see does not answer my objection. That objection is, that if this question has been decided and the President has not the power of supervision now, which he has in some cases, I am not disposed to amend what he calls a defect in the law by giving him that power. I would rather leave it as it is at the present time, because I believe that the decision is much more likely to be correct, as made by the constituted tribunal than it would be if made by him; for you must necessarily see that the President will be beset and surrounded by the individuals themselves, and their friends. Influences, not improper influences, but those which address themselves to a man's better feelings, may be brought to bear upon him, and I believe he would be much more likely to do injury to the Navy, in which Congress and the people are interested, than to the individuals who are only interested for themselves, and whose friends are particularly interested for them.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe I have been unfortunate in stating my position, as I perceive the gentleman does not exactly understand it. What I say is, that the President has the power of supervision now, that he has to examine and approve or disapprove the finding of the court; but if he disapproves, he can apply no remedy, however hard the case may be.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that. What would be the power conferred by the passage of this resolution? It would be a power to supervise. By "supervise," I mean to change the decision that has been made. He may not approve it; but if he does not approve it, it does not change the relative position of the officer. He stands under the decision of the court, as I understand; but this is a proposition to reverse the decision of the court—a power which I am unwilling to confer.

I believe the great mistake which has been made in this business from the beginning, in all the argument that has been had here, and all the excitement which has grown up, and the greater part of the denunciations which have been indulged in with regard to this act, and what was done under the act, arises from the sympathy which has been excited in the minds of men with reference to individuals; leaving too much out of sight the real interests of the country. I do not believe that so much harm has been done to the country by the action of the retiring board. I believe great good has followed from it. I was in favor of the act. I thought it was abused, not intentionally, but accidentally, if I may so express myself. I voted for the bill which was passed to enable these gentlemen to receive justice, if justice had not been done. I believe, and I have heard no complaint to the contrary, that there has been a fair examination; that there has been a most anxious desire to restore all who were deserving of restoration; and that having been done, I see not why we should be so anxious to afflict ourselves, and to bring upon us the revision of the whole matter, and trouble the Senate with investigating cases which ought now to be considered as finally disposed of. I adhere, therefore, to my original impression, and hope the resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. MALLORY. It is quite evident that we are to be led into a debate. A number of other gentlemen desire to speak on this question. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no; let us pass the resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. If there is any probability of obtaining the vote on this question, I shall not press my motion.

Mr. CLAY and others. Let us take the vote.

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BIGGS. I desire to inquire whether the joint resolution has undergone the scrutiny of the Committee on Naval Affairs? My attention has not been particularly directed to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was reported this morning by that committee.

Mr. BIGGS. This is an amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the resolution reported by the committee?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTER. If I understand the amendment, it is proposed to authorize the President to reduce, at pleasure, the rank of those who have been already disposed of by the action of the naval board—to put them down, as well as up.

Mr. MALLORY. I will put my friend from Virginia right. The President has no power, under existing law, to take an officer who is receiving the pay of the reserved list and put him on the furlough list, to receive its pay. I will illustrate it by an example: A lieutenant on the reserved list receives $1,200, and upon the furlough list, $600. The Secretary of the Navy, from time immemorial in our service, has exercised this very power of placing an officer on furlough pay at his discretion. It has only been exercised, however, where an officer has rendered himself amenable to censure. I propose to give the President of the United States power, whenever, in his judgment, the service may require it, to take any officer who has subjected himself to censure from the reserved list, and put him on the furlough list, as heretofore has been the practice of the Navy Department.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I understand it has been the practice heretofore, under the general authority given to the Secretary of the Navy, to put any officer, whether in the active service or not, on the furlough list. Whether this resolution passes or not, that general power remains, and that is sufficient.

Mr. MALLORY. It does not remain.

Mr. HUNTER. He may not be able to change the status as fixed by the act of the retiring board, but he can at any time transfer men from active service to the furlough list.

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, from active service.

This only applies to those on the reserved list. He will have no authority under this resolution to take an officer from the active list and put him on either of the others; but he may take him from the reserved list and reduce him to furlough pay. Under existing laws he has no such power; but the Secretary now exercises the power of taking an officer from the active list and putting him on the furlough list.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not perceive any object in giving the President this power, unless to enable him to revise the action of the board in these cases in some other way than that pointed out by law. On what ground is he to transfer an officer from the retired to the furlough list—he is out of the service, doing nothing—unless he commits some fault in the mean time, which ought, perhaps, to be the subject of inquiry by court-martial or court of inquiry? I see no object in granting this power, especially as he has still general authority to transfer any man from the active service, who may be in the way of committing errors, to the furlough list. That is enough, and I should prefer that the amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. MALLORY. I think there will be no danger in conferring this power on the Executive. We have seen by our past experience that the Executive is very tardy in exercising any power in this branch of the service which will reduce the pay of any officer. It is very rarely exercised indeed; but I can very well conceive that officers on the reserved list may sometimes render themselves amenable to such harsh censure as would justify a call for this reduction of pay. It is not permanent. The President has power now to place them up, but not down. I think we may safely confer this power on the commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy. The presumption is, it will always be exercised for the healthfulness of the corps, and not to its injury.

Mr. HUNTER. It might be safe to confer on the President the power to transfer men to the active service list from these various grades; but Congress seems to have thought otherwise in its legislation on this subject. It has fixed the grades under this law. I am not disposed, for the present at least, to disturb that arrangement, or to enlarge the powers the President has under his general authority. That is sufficient. If a man commits any offense, let a court of inquiry be called. If he is not in active service in any way, or connected with the Government in any way, I should prefer that it should be left where it was left by the law. Now, if I understand it, a man in any position, if he commits an offense, is subject to a court-martial, and that is sufficient. I perceive no reason why you should give this limited authority, which would not extend to a general grant of power, to the President, to place any officer of the Navy wherever he chooses on these lists.

Mr. DAVIS. I really think the effect of the amendment would be slight. An officer on the reserved list, never being on duty, would never be under the eye of anybody who would report his irregularities of conduct; and I think that because it would have no effect, it will be harmless. I see no one who would be in a position to take cognizance of an officer who had been retired from active service, unless by some very disgraceful act he should become odious to the community in which he lived, and become unfit to wear the uniform of the United States, and then he ought to be dropped from the rolls altogether.

Mr. BAYARD. I am opposed both to the amendment of the honorable Senator from Florida and to the original resolution in its present form. I confess myself unable to see any reason for confiding the discretion which the amendment would give to the President; and, as a general rule, I am opposed to granting discretion in such cases, unless where it is necessary that it should be yielded. Under the present law, before the passage of the act of 1855, the Secretary of the Navy frequently exercised the power of placing on furlough pay an officer who was in active service or who was on leave pay. That power still remains, and ought to remain. I can see no reason why that discretion should be given either to the President or to the Secretary of the Navy with respect to those on the retired list, which embraces officers upon furlough and upon leave pay. When the law of 1855 was passed, it professed that where an officer was to be retired without default of his own, he should be retired with leave pay; and that where the cause of retirement arose from his own fault, and that was established to the satisfaction of the board to whom the inquiry was intrusted, and their finding was approved by the President, he should be placed on the reserved list with furlough pay. If these officers are not in active service, I can see no ground for conferring upon the President an arbitrary power to change their condition when there is no opportunity for default on their part. Why confer on the President authority to say that an officer who has performed honorable service, and who has been retired at a certain rate of pay, shall be reduced to furlough pay? It seems to me to be unjust in principle. I can perceive no good object in granting this power, though I can well conceive its necessity with regard to the active service list of the Navy.

Next, as to the resolution itself. My objection is that it confines the proposed relief to those officers who have appeared before the courts of inquiry constituted under the act of the last session. Why confine the relief to them? On the contrary, my judgment would rather incline me to the conclusion that these officers having been heard before courts composed of their fellows and their peers, if they have been unable to obtain a verdict in favor of an alteration of their condition, the matter should be ended as to them, for the good of the service. There may be individual cases of injustice; I have no very strong opinion that courts of inquiry or courts-martial are tribunals in which justice is administered with any remarkable degree of accuracy; but still they are the tribunals which adjust questions of this kind in our service. You have given these officers an opportunity to go before these tribunals. As to those who have availed themselves of it, and have had from a court of inquiry a judgment against a change of their condition, I do not feel disposed to interfere further. If we interfere now, there will be no end to the constant complaints that will be made to us. But as regards many officers who were honorably retired on leave pay by the action of the first board, and did not appear before the courts of inquiry, why should they be precluded from this relief, if you are to give it at all? I can well understand why many of them would not appear, though they might suppose that the court would probably reverse the action of the board in regard to them. I know one instance of this kind, and I think Senators will understand and appreciate the motives of the officer. An officer in your service, one among the most distinguished in it—one among the few who, in the war of 1812, was a lieutenant, engaged in two naval actions—that between the Constitution and the Guerriere, and that between the United States and the Macedonian—has been retired on leave pay, honorably retired. In speaking to me of going before a court of inquiry for the purpose of having the recommendation of the board which placed him on the retired list reversed, he said: "I cannot do it, sir; I have commanded every man who is a member of that court; I feel my own competency; I cannot, consistently with my own personal character and personal pride, agree to submit the question of my ability to perform service, as a matter of opinion, to men who have been under my command."

I appreciate the feeling, and as to that class of men I should be perfectly willing to grant to the President of the United States the power to nominate them to the Senate to fill their old places on the active list, if he thinks the judgment of the first board was an error. I cannot support this resolution, because it excludes entirely from its benefits those officers who have not chosen to appear before the courts of inquiry, and applies only to those who have had a hearing. It may be that this hearing was an imperfect one, but it was such a one as Congress chose to accord. If on that hearing they have not been able to vindicate themselves in the judgment of their peers, I am not disposed further to swell the relative ranks of the Navy for their benefit, and keep up a course of contention which does nothing but demoralize the service.

Mr. CLAY. If any other gentleman wishes to make any remarks on the resolution, I shall move to lay it on the table, as there are other matters which ought to occupy the attention of the Senate. If, however, no one wishes to speak, I am willing to let the vote be taken.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask the Senator to withdraw his motion, to enable me to say a very few words.

Mr. CLAY. I will do so.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think there ought to be no difference of opinion in the Senate as to the passage of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Mississippi. It only places the officers who have been before these courts of inquiry on the same basis as other officers in the Army and Navy. It allows the President, in cases where he disapproves the sentence of the court of inquiry, to give effect to that disapproval, and send the officers to us for promotion if he thinks proper. Then the whole case will be before us, and we can examine it. It is said that the proceedings of these courts are held by the Committee on Naval Affairs of this body not to be obligatory. It is rumored, at least out of doors, that they dissent from some of the findings of the court and recommendations of the President; and do not, as a universal rule, report for confirmation appointments made by the President, in pursuance of the findings of these courts.

The resolution of the Senator from Mississippi only applies to these men a general law that has obtained since 1789 in our service. They have been before a court of inquiry, and the facts have been submitted to the President. If he disapproves the sentence, let it become null, and let him nominate those men for their old places, if he thinks proper. I repeat, that is exactly the law which has obtained in both the military and the naval service from the beginning of the Government. I think the resolution is eminently just, and I can see no reason for refusing to pass it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama renew his motion?

Mr. CLAY. If the Senate is prepared to vote on the resolution I do not urge it.

Mr. STUART. Excuse me for saying to the Senator, that if he designs to have an acquiescence in the suggestion that there shall be no more debate, I shall want to consume a few minutes.

Mr. CLAY. Then I move to lay the resolution on the table. I have not read it myself, and I have not heard it read. If a printed copy has been laid on my desk, it has been removed. I suppose other Senators would like to read it. It can be called up to-morrow.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. We are far advanced now, and nearly ready for the vote. I hope we shall be allowed to vote.

Mr. CLAY. At the instance of several Senators around me, I withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SLIDELL. There is one point in this question which seems to have escaped the attention of Senators, and I think reconciles the objection of the Senator from Michigan. I agree with him perfectly as to the absolute constitutional power of the President to fill any vacant office in the Navy by the nomination of any man who has either been in the Navy before, or who has been taken from private life. It is a power which I take it for granted he would never exercise; and if he did, his action would not receive the approbation of the Senate. There is sufficient guarantee against any such abuse of power. But as the case now stands, the President, although entirely satisfied that injustice may have been done to any particular officer by the finding of either of the courts of inquiry, has no power to remedy it. As has been very properly said by the Senator from Mississippi, the consequence of his disapproval of the action of any one of these courts, in a case in which that action had been unfavorable to the officer whose character and standing had been investigated, would be simply saying "I disapprove it," leaving the officer to stand exactly where he stood before. There might be a remedy for an evil of that sort under ordinary circumstances, but the President really has no discretion at all.

The naval establishment is regulated by law. It is composed of a certain number of captains, commanders, lieutenants, midshipmen, and officers of other grades. When we passed the law authorizing the establishment of a reserved list, and afterwards passed the law by which we instituted certain courts of inquiry for the reconsideration of the cases of the officers who had been set aside, we declared that they might be restored to the active list of the Navy; but we accompanied that privilege with the condition that when these men had been so restored, there should be no further appointments until, by death, dismissal, or other causes, the total list of active officers of the Navy had been reduced to that limit which we considered the proper limit for our naval establishment. We may have fourteen or fifteen more officers in each grade of the Navy now, than is authorized by law. There can be and will be no vacancies, probably, for two or three years. Therefore, however satisfied the President may be, on investigation, that justice was not done to an officer, originally, by the board of fifteen, in dismissing him, or by the action of the court reconsidering his case, the President is deprived of power altogether. That is his position now as regards the distinguished officer to whom the Senator from Delaware alludes. There are no vacancies in the naval establishment. I am stating a case of such extreme merit as that of the officer to whom the Senator from Delaware has alluded. Unquestionably the board could have arrived at no other conclusion, notwithstanding his distinguished services. Everybody admitted that he was not qualified for active service. Still, the President of the United States might, perhaps, at this moment be disposed to remedy, not what was injustice to this officer by the board of naval officers, but the undue harshness of the law in its application to him, and might be disposed to place him at the head of the list of the Navy—a position he once filled and adorned. That the President might be disposed to do; yet, under the existing law, he has no such power.

Now, as I understand it, the intention of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Mississippi, and reported back with an amendment by the Naval Committee, is to give the President the power of exercising discretion in certain cases. I am inclined to think that the exercise of that power by him will be very limited. But there is one circumstance attending the whole of this investigation which, perhaps, is not understood by the Senate. I happen to know that the President has never examined a record in any one of these cases. He has either not had the disposition or the time; he certainly has not had the time to examine any one of the records brought before him in cases which it is understood have been sent to the Senate for confirmation. The Senate will be called on, then, to pass on these nominations as if they were original appointments. It is equally the case in regard to the action of the court where the findings have been unfavorable, that the President and Secretary of the Navy have not considered them. In the one case, the President has not examined these records because he has not had time to do so; and in the other, because he was satisfied that, even if he did examine them, no action could result, because, if he were dissatisfied with the proceedings of the board, still he could not remedy the evil which had been done. I think the statement I have made will remove the objection that has been brought forward by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. STUART. I desire the attention of the Senate for only a few minutes. I agree that the fact which has just been stated by the Senator from Louisiana would be sufficient to induce me to vote for this joint resolution if I could get over the constitutional difficulty to which I have referred; but I regard it as a dilemma in which we have placed ourselves by departing from that species of legislation which is in conformity to the Constitution. If anything were necessary to convince one of the error into which we have fallen, it would be the speech of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. He asserts that because Congress, at the last session, undertook to impose a limitation on the authority of the President of the United States, after the action of the courts of inquiry, and undertook to provide also the very place to which he should make his nominations, it is necessary to continue the error and pass this resolution. It seems to me that that is not sound reasoning.

It is said by the honorable Senator from Louisiana that the President, under the Constitution, possesses unlimited authority in regard to the selection of his nominees. If we had never undertaken to trench on that power, we should not have been in any difficulty. I am not going back to review the history of legislation on this subject. I did very briefly, while it was under consideration, express my objections, the chief of which was, that a man might be inefficient, and might be conceded by his best friends to be inefficient for a particular service; yet that inefficiency might not be of a character which one could specify against him, and prove upon charges before a court of inquiry. I instanced, as an illustration, that a gentleman might desire a particular, important service performed, and out of twenty he would select one as being the only one in the twenty fit for the performance of the duties; that then, being called upon by the other nineteen to show why they were not fit, and to prove it before a court of inquiry or a jury, it would not be within his power, and yet he would know it as well as he knew his own existence. Hence, sir, I was in favor of the mode proposed by the law of 1855, to weed out the Navy—to use the language of the Senator from Maine—to constitute a board who would know the qualities and qualifications of the officers; and knowing them, would exercise that duty more properly than anybody else could. But, as I said, I am not going into that subject. It is now proposed to go still further, and to add to the Navy a number of officers who are not needed for the duties incident to that branch of our service; but to add to the number for the purpose of doing justice to particular individuals. If I believed that this was the mode to do justice to them, and at the same time do justice to the public service, it would constitute a strong reason for favorable action by my vote upon this proposition. But, sir, I do not; and I confess I cannot agree with the honorable Senator from Mississippi that we enter into any contract, or quasi contract, with an officer when he receives an appointment in the Navy.

The substance of that appointment is simply this, that so long as he performs his duty properly, and so long as the Government of the United States needs his service, so long is he entitled to the rules of promotion incident to it; but it is reserved to the President of the United States to drop him from the service whenever he chooses. It is reserved to the Congress of the United States, under the authority expressly conferred by the Constitution, to revise the Navy law according to its best discretion, and to affect him in his position, and in his line of promotion, according to their judgment.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator state where the President gets power to drop an officer whenever he chooses?

Mr. STUART. I should be very glad to do that if it would not occupy more time than the honorable Senator would desire me to consume to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. It would require a good while.

Mr. STUART. I have not any excessive confidence in my own ability; yet I have a confident belief that I can establish that proposition by a process of reasoning which the honorable Senator himself may perhaps find it a little difficult to overthrow. It is sufficient to state that that is my conviction, and that I am proceeding on it; however, that is not involved in this question. This is a simple question, whether, for the purpose of doing justice to some individuals who are now out of the active service, it is best to add to the Navy list, and in doing that to exercise a species of legislation not warranted in my opinion—and I give it with all that respect for the opinions of others which I ought—by the Constitution itself. I only wished just time enough to save my own consistency on this subject, and to save what I believe to be an important consistency of the Senate, as it will be found, if we shall proceed hereafter with this character of legislation, believing we have had experience enough already to show that, having varied from constitutional authority, we have got ourselves into deep difficulty, and that the further we travel in the path of error, the more the number of those difficulties will be increased.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish to make a very few remarks, and shall not occupy the attention of the Senate more than five minutes. We now know, what I suppose must of necessity be the fact, that the President of the United States has not had time to examine these records. If he has examined any, they were those which he was compelled immediately to approve—that is, the reports which were favorable to the officers tried. As to the unfavorable reports, it is impossible that he can have even read them. It would, I suppose, have been competent for the President, if he had had time to examine these records and found that the evidence, instead of convicting a man, tended entirely to his exoneration, to have sent back the record for reexamination by the court, thus affording an opportunity for reconsideration; but that required an examination of the record, and he has not, in point of fact, made that examination, and the law is about to expire.

Under these circumstances, can anything be more just than to say to the President, "when you have time hereafter to examine these records and find that injustice has been done and dishonor unduly inflicted on a meritorious officer, nominate him to us, and we will consider whether we will not restore him to his place?" Can anything be more just? Can anything be more fair? Sir, I think it is not necessary to look any further to justify and warrant this resolution, when it is required by that justice which is due to one of our own officers, wronged in consequence of our own act, dishonored in consequence of our own act, and degraded in the service to which a lifetime had dedicated him. If the President, upon an examination of this record, finds an officer to be of meritorious service, though by some inadvertence, or some lapse, or some other cause, I care not what, he has been unjustly condemned, ought it not to be remedied and rectified? I say it ought; and that is a primary consideration; and that established, all else is naught.

My friend from Michigan is afraid to do this palpable justice; because, he says, we have a consistency to preserve, and he will preserve his. It is a fear of some little inconsistency. Had he not better be guilty of a thousand inconsistencies than one act of injustice? But there is some nicety about a constitutional question which he apprehends may lead to future embarrassment and future difficulty. I say the same as to that—had he not better encounter a thousand little niceties and embarrassments that amount to nothing, than refuse justice, which can only be granted in the form now proposed by the Senator from Mississippi? I think so. For myself, I can easily set aside all these considerations and all these niceties, and all these little inconveniences, for the sake of accomplishing what I believe to be the solemn justice of this case. I hope, therefore, that the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi will be adopted.

I see no great use in the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It seems to me to amount to very little, at best. My friend from Delaware wishes it also to embrace those who have not been tried. That may be another consideration altogether. I agree with him in his appreciation of the character of Commodore Stewart, the officer to whom I suppose he alludes, and in the justice of restoring him; but, for considerations satisfactory to his proud bosom, he declines to go before the court. Why is this power of the President to restore, given in respect to those cases only which have been before the courts? It is because there the President has a record; he does not listen to out-of-door solicitations or representations. Here is a record of sworn testimony. He can refer to that and be guided by it in his action on the subject; and guided by that, there is no danger that the President will give way to any improper considerations or motives. We give him a guide: take this record; examine the testimony, the judgment of the court; and if you say that that judgement is clearly unsustained by the evidence, and that a meritorious officer has been sacrificed, do him justice, or afford the Senate an opportunity of doing it, by nominating him to them. I hope the resolution will be adopted. I think the amendment is useless, and need not be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BIGGS. I have just now, for the first time, had an opportunity to read the resolution which is pending. If it has been laid on my desk, it has escaped my notice entirely; and therefore the inquiry which I made, some time since, of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, whether it had undergone the scrutiny of that committee? I find that it has been reported by that committee favorably, with an amendment, which has been voted down, the purpose of which was to extend the discretion of the President of the United States in regard to these naval officers. From my experience here on this question, it seems to me the Senators are very much controlled by their feelings and sympathies for individual cases of naval officers. It is perfectly natural that they should be controlled to a considerable extent by their sympathies in behalf of individual officers.

If I understand the effect of this resolution, it is to change the existing laws, and to confide to the President of the United States a discretion, which he does not now possess, to increase the naval establishment. I voted for the bill of last year, authorizing a revision of the action of the original board of inquiry, which was provided for by Congress before I became a member of this body, because of the great clamor which was made in the Senate as to injustice to individual officers. I voted for it under the expectation that full justice would be done under it, and that there the matter would end. But now it seems there is complaint that another revising body of the Navy has done injustice; and that, in consequence of the present state of the law, the President has not discretionary power to revise the action of these courts of inquiry, and do justice to every member of the Navy.

It seems to me, sir, that we are acting on a principle which I cannot approve at all—namely, that the naval establishment is made for officers of the Navy, instead of being made for the benefit of the country. These officers have undergone an investigation before two tribunals of inquiry, and it seems to me that it is wrong to endeavor to extend further favor to them, the consequences of which will be to increase the expenses of the Navy, and to increase the naval establishment to an extent which is totally useless, so far as the country is concerned. I am totally opposed to the passage of the resolution. I can see no necessity for it. The only object which, it appears to me, will be attained by it, will be to extend to the President of the United States a discretion, which he has not a right to exercise under existing laws, to disapprove the action of these courts of inquiry, and place upon the Navy list men who are now retired from the Navy; thus increasing the expenses of the Navy, and enlarging the number of officers, which seems to me not to be desirable.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will not occupy the time of the Senate at the present moment, on the subject of these naval boards and courts. I desire to go into that subject when it may be legitimately presented, and when the leisure of the Senate will be more suited to my design than it is at present. I will not delay the passage of this resolution, because I think it is very important that it should pass. It does not constrain the President to do any improper act. It authorizes him to do within his discretion what is proper—to restore certain officers; not to make original appointment of individuals, but to make such changes as he may deem necessary, judging from all the information before him. For these reasons I will postpone any remarks I intended to make on the general subject, and I hope the vote will be taken on this resolution.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to move an amendment to the resolution, and if it be adopted I may vote for it, but certainly not without it. It is to strike out all after the word "where," in the third line, to the word "of," inclusive, in the sixth line, and insert "it is deemed advisable by the." The words I propose to strike out are "the records of the courts of inquiry appointed under the act of January 16, 1857, may render it advisable in the opinion of."

It would then read:

"That in any case where it is deemed advisable by the President of the United States to restore to the active or reserved list of the Navy, or to transfer from furlough to leave of absence on the latter list, any officer who may have been dropped or retired by the operation of the act of February 28, 1855, entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,' he shall have authority, any existing law to the contrary notwithstanding, to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, such officer to the active or reserved list; and officers so nominated and confirmed shall occupy positions on the active and reserved lists, respectively, according to rank and seniority when dropped or retired as aforesaid, and be entitled to all the benefits conferred by the act approved January 16, 1857, on officers restored or transferred to the active or reserved list under that act."

I can conceive no reason in justice why an officer who has applied for this court of inquiry and has been rejected on a hearing before it, should be placed in a better position as regards the discretion confided to the President, with the confirmation of the Senate, than an officer who has not applied. I have stated one case, and I am sure there are numerous others, in which officers on the same high ground were unwilling to go before their juniors for the purpose of having their capacity acted on, as a matter of professional pride. I do not see why we should exclude them from the benefit of the exercise of the discretion of the President any more than the officer who has been heard, and who has not obtained any advantage from his hearing.

Mr. DAVIS. Making no question on the point of rule involved in this amendment—passing that over—I wish to say to the Senate (because my object is rather to present the question upon its merits, and I had hoped to get the entire concurrence of the Senate) that this would devolve on the President the necessity of taking oral testimony in every possible case where an applicant might choose to present himself. By the resolution, as originally prepared, he was protected from this; and the certain basis on which the President acted was to come with his nomination to the Senate, by confining him to those cases which were of record. Thus the Senate would have the power to revise, not only the action of the President in gross, but the basis upon which he made his nominations. It seems to me that this limitation is proper and necessary, and, unless the Senator from Delaware will have a dual President, it is quite clear he cannot have the power to take that amount of oral testimony which would be necessary to hear all the cases that would be brought before him.

Then, sir, I must object to the idea that a senior officer might properly refuse to go before these courts. It may do for the head of the Navy to look down upon the members of such a court as his inferiors, and in him such a sentiment may be excused; but I rather respect that great body of officers who, feeling secure in their own devotion and integrity to the country, have come forward and challenged investigation before a court of record. I am sure that the Senator from Delaware, if he stood arraigned upon any charge whatever, would much prefer that the testimony should be of record, and defy his accusers to meet him face to face. I think that it was mainly pride that brought most of these gentlemen before the courts of inquiry, and I doubt not that in most cases justice has been rendered. I am unwilling, reluctant, to that degree that I will not, unless further pressed, go into particular cases; but it is within my knowledge, and I could prove it in one case, at least, that injustice, gross injustice has been done, and that the individual stands now in the attitude of a man who, for an early fault, is to be held as dropped, never to be forgiven for the offenses of his youth. Six years of faithful service and good conduct, some of it distinguished, too, cannot relieve him from the fact of his having, at an earlier period of his life, as he admitted himself before the court, been guilty of intemperance.

But, sir, it is said that this is a proposition to make a navy for officers, and not for the country. No, sir; no. It is not to establish a navy; it is a proposition to do justice to man—a higher and a holier motive than the number of dollars and cents which may be involved in the expenditure. It is not to make a navy, not to prescribe the number of officers in the Navy, except so far as justice may require, that we shall increase the number in each grade; and as long as there is a dollar in the Treasury, or credit for the Government, I am ready and anxious to fulfill that first obligation of a Government to its citizens—to do justice. How far it will increase the expenditure, how many will be nominated, I have not cared to inquire; I have no means of knowing. I should hope, for the honor of the Navy, that but few cases have been passed over where the records will sustain the President in making nominations and the Senate in confirming them. Be they few, or be they many, I repeat, the high obligation of justice impels us to the act, and I am willing to meet it, cost what it may.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the answer which the honorable Senator from Mississippi gives to my amendment is twofold. First, he says that the President of the United States would have too much labor cast on him if he were to take oral testimony for the purpose of examining the propriety of renominating any officers other than those who appeared before the courts of inquiry, and that he means to limit his investigations simply to the records in those cases. I hardly think that is sufficient, if the question of justice be weighed in the balance. The President may take his own means of inquiry. It is proposed to grant him a mere discretion. It is not necessary that he should go into a hearing, or have any court of inquiry. It is to put in his power, as I think ought to have been put there originally, the reappointment of those officers whom he conceives were placed on the reserved list without cause.

The second objection is, that, in the opinion of the honorable Senator, it is not a proper pride, except in the head of the Navy, for any officer to decline a hearing before the tribunals constituted by the act of 1857, but that he ought to have been willing to place himself there if any charge existed against him. I should agree with the honorable Senator from Mississippi, if the law of 1855—this, as I view it, iniquitous and injurious law—had involved the question of charge against the officers; but we were told, in all the discussions subsequently, that there was no imputation cast on those who were retired with leave pay; that it was simply done because they could not perform their duties as promptly and efficiently, relatively with other officers, as might be desired. It was intimated that it might be because old age had advanced upon them, or because of some temporary disability. In all these cases, especially in a case of age, where an officer had rendered distinguished service to the country, I can perfectly understand that he would be unwilling to leave the question of his promptness and efficiency to the mere opinion of men whom he had commanded twenty years ago. If there had been charges affecting his moral character, or his mental capacity, it might be that the officer would desire to have a court of inquiry, for there would be something tangible in that; but I can readily understand that an officer of advanced life, though he may not have the activity of youth, still feeling in himself full competency for the performance of his duties, would certainly demur to going before his juniors for the purpose of taking their opinion as to whether he was still sufficiently capable to perform his services. That is the class of cases which I wish to embrace, and I do not see any harm or danger in doing so, either because of any labor that would be thrown on the President, or in apprehension of injury to the service. I think it is but sheer justice.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no objection to the resolution, if a limitation be added that nothing which it contains shall authorize an increase in the number of officers in active service as now allowed by law. When vacancies occur, I am willing that the President shall exercise this power, which he would have a right to do, according to the view of his constitutional authority taken by the Senator from Michigan; but I am not willing to allow him, at his pleasure or discretion, to enlarge the number of officers as fixed by law to be employed in the active service of the Navy. That number was fixed after careful consideration of the interests of the country and of the Navy. I am for adhering to that number, and not increasing it. I am willing to allow the President to nominate anybody he chooses to fill any vacancy which may occur in that number hereafter. If the proviso which I have suggested be added to the resolution, I shall vote for it.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator whether it would cover his objection to say the number should not be increased by any promotion until it had been reduced, if there was any excess to the standard number? That has usually been done.

Mr. SLIDELL. That is the law now.

Mr. HUNTER. If the proviso be attached so that the operation of this new resolution shall not increase the number the law allows in active service, I will vote for it. If I understand the Senator from Mississippi, that is what he proposes.

Mr. DAVIS. Not exactly. It would be that the number in the established Navy should not be increased; but that if an officer, now retired, should be nominated and put on the active list, then the vacancies which occur until the whole excess has been reduced to the standard number, shall not be filled by further promotions.

Mr. SLIDELL. That is the law now.

Mr. HUNTER. That would not attain my object. I am for confining the numbers to those which are fixed by the law; that is, I am for keeping the personnel of the Navy where the law now fixes it. I will vote for a resolution to enable the President to nominate to any vacancy that may occur in any of these classes, if that proviso be appended.

Mr. MALLORY. I am unwilling to vote for the amendment of my friend from Delaware, and I will briefly state the reasons. The courts of inquiry were open to every officer who was affected by the retiring board. I believe about one hundred and nine officers only applied; perhaps there were one hundred and ten. Nine, I think, withdrew; and of the remainder, the courts of inquiry have restored to the active service, if we are to judge by the printed reports in the papers, thirty-three; they have changed from the furlough to the reserved list twenty-nine, and they have left unchanged, where the retiring board placed them, some forty-nine.

Now it is proposed to extend this provision to those officers who refused to go before the courts of inquiry. There is no pretense that they were out of the country and had not the opportunity. We are called upon to vote for the amendment on the ground that it was a matter of pride with some that they would not go before a court of inquiry. If it was a matter of pride in the first instance, will not pride restrain them hereafter, when they shall have an opportunity in the future—for a court of inquiry is the natural and efficient resort to which the President will come, to inquire into their efficiency? Is not a court of inquiry that court to which naval officers always resort? Talk to us of officers, as a matter of pride, refusing to go to that tribunal which the law and the custom of the service to which they belong specially points them! No, sir; they have refused to go before the court, though it has been open for twelve months; and now it is proposed to extend the action of these courts of inquiry—that is all—because the President of the United States will resort to them; he will not undertake to wade through the records of parties applying to him without the aid of scrutinizers.

One of these records, to my knowledge, now amounts to six hundred pages; and you not only entail on the President the labor of examining it, but you entail further on him, for time out of mind, without limitation, for years hence if you please, on the application of any persons who have been retired by the board, although they refused to go before the court, the burden of undertaking their investigation. In view of the labor it might throw on the Executive, after the ample opportunity these parties have had, I would say reject this amendment. If there is any pretense that there has been any case where injustice has been done and an officer has unjustly been withheld from going before the courts of inquiry, that he was out of the country, that he was sick, that any reasonable excuse can be given for failing to avail himself of the provisions the law has pointed out, I will vote for it immediately; but I cannot see the propriety of voting for this amendment as it is.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I dislike, very much, to detain the Senate, but I have one or two remarks to make in opposition to the proposition of my friend from Delaware. I do not desire to refer to the policy of this law, as originally passed by us, any further than to recall to the recollection of the Senate that there was one universal concurrence in the opinion that the Navy required an extensive and radical reform. A difference of opinion exists as to the wisdom of the measures which we adopted for that reform. Those measures have been very thoroughly discussed in the Senate, and of course it is not now my purpose to recur to the arguments which I used in defending them, or to reply to those which have, on different occasions, been used in opposition.

But, sir, on the representation of those officers whose names had been reported as proper to be put on a leave of absence or furlough list, loud complaint was made that they had been condemned, as it was termed, unheard; that a secret tribunal had passed upon their merits, and that in many cases they had been deprived of rank and office on rumors which they could prove to be unjust. The theory of the law, as I originally understood it, was a simple examination into the efficiency of those officers to perform public duty—not their characters, not their moral standing, but that kind of inquiry which every employer has at all times a right to institute in relation to the capacity of his employé to perform effective duty. Yielding, however, to the complaints of those officers, which in some instances, I must confess, appeared to be well founded, we authorized every person dissatisfied with the result of the inquiry, to ask for a fresh examination—an examination to suit himself, and gave him an opportunity which was all that he said he craved, to introduce the witnesses who could disprove the suggestions made against his efficiency in the service. Many officers availed themselves of these courts of inquiry, and have thus proven that they were sincere in the complaints they originally made. Others by their silence and inaction have evinced, as I am entitled to infer, an entire acquiescence in the position to which they were reduced by the action of the first retiring board. There are over one hundred officers, if I am not mistaken in my recollection, perfectly satisfied, so far as we have reason to know, with their position as retired officers. About one hundred officers asked for an examination. Some thirty or forty have succeeded on that examination in having their status in the Navy changed to their benefit, and nominations in relation to those officers are understood to be before us, although the suggestions on that subject have been made, I think rather indiscreetly in open session, where we have no right to refer to the presidential action on appointments. Still it has been taken for granted as a fact publicly known, that a certain number of those officers have been recommended for restoration to their former rank in the Navy.

Now my friend from Delaware ingrafts on the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi, an amendment to throw open the Navy list to all of these one hundred and odd officers, who, by their silence, during the whole time allowed them by law for making complaint, have signified their acquiescence in the position to which they have been reduced, and that it shall be within the discretion of the President to restore the whole of these one hundred and ten retired officers to the active list of the Navy. I understand the amendment of my friend to be that it shall be within the discretion of the President to nominate for restoration to the Navy or for superior status to that now occupied by them, all officers who have not chosen to demand courts of inquiry. If this proposition is dictated by a desire to do honor to one distinguished exception, in whose case my friend from Delaware seems to take peculiar interest, if the idea is on account of eminent public service to do honor to Commodore Stewart, and a law is brought forward for his exceptional case, I might be tempted to vote for it, in order to oblige my friend from Delaware, however I might be opposed to exceptional legislation of this kind; but I trust that the Senate will reflect long and well ere it consents to throw within Executive power the restoration to rank and office of over one hundred officers of the Navy, who are now upon the retired and furlough lists, whose pay is inferior to that which they would be entitled to if they were restored to the active list, who are now without the line of promotion, and therefore cannot, for the future, increase the expenses of the Navy, and all that, so far as I can see, with a desire of reaching one or two exceptional cases. The whole work would be undone, the Navy restored to the condition in which it was before the reform took place, and I think with very deleterious effect on the public service.

There is one consideration, Mr. President, which, it seems to me, ought to strike Senators with some force. It is this: if you look around upon the list of Senators who supported this reform and those who were opposed to it, you will find the singular fact, almost without exception, that every Senator who represents a commercial community, every Senator whose avocation or previous pursuits in life have led him to an intimate acquaintance with the Navy, all those who live on the sea-shore, or in large ports, supported this reform; whilst those gentlemen who lived in the interior, and whose attention had not been brought so directly to a knowledge of those abuses which existed in the Navy, have had their sympathies appealed to by particular friends and the relatives of particular friends to such a point that in almost every instance, with a desire to reach and benefit a particular individual, they have not hesitated to oppose the entire measure of reform. I say that this existed in many cases. I by no means attempt to impute these partial views to every Senator who opposed the reform measure; but I think it is somewhat singular that nearly every gentleman whose former life brought him into active or immediate connection with commercial or naval matters was strenuous in support of this reform. Now the proposition of my friend from Delaware breaks it all up again by giving the opportunity, at the discretion of the Executive, of restoring the whole of these retired officers to the active list of the Navy, wherever they have thought proper not to demand a fresh inquiry. I trust the Senate will vote that down at least. So far as the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi is concerned, I am not in favor of it, but it cannot do much harm, and I shall not be strenuous in my opposition to it.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator from Louisiana entirely misunderstood me if he supposed it was with reference to any individual interest of mine in any particular case that I moved this amendment. I sought to illustrate the matter by a case within my knowledge, but not one that appealed particularly to me. I think neither the honorable Senator from Louisiana nor any other member of this body, has had less regard to the individuals who might be reached by the operation of the former law or of the present law, than I have had. I think the honorable Senator is under a mistake as to the mode in which he classifies the different interests in opposition to the law for the reform of the Navy, passed in 1855. I do not claim for myself any particular knowledge of the Navy, but I rather think I have perhaps as much knowledge of the naval service and naval officers as many of those who voted for that law.

I thought, however, from the beginning, that it was an iniquitous law. I thought it was a law that struck at the very foundations of the service. I think its effect has been, and will be, never to produce any good to the Navy, under any circumstances comparable to the evil which has flown from it; and I was willing at the last session, as I am now, to give a discretion to the President, with the consent of the Senate, without any courts of inquiry at all, to replace any officer on the list without further action.

I should be perfectly willing to take that course, and I have thought it more advisable than the course which was taken by the law providing for these courts of inquiry. I believe they have only tended to produce heart-burnings and jealousies in the Navy. The results of their findings being mere matters of opinion, and not a judgment upon specific facts, I think they are nearly as likely to have arrived at a wrong result as the naval board, where the hearing was purely ex parte. I am not satisfied with the mode of inquiry, and therefore I desire, at any time when it may be within my power, to bring it back to its true principle, and leave the President on his responsibility to nominate any of these officers to us for restoration. I am not willing, however, to let the power be partially exercised, to include some and exclude others.

I think my friend from Louisiana is mistaken in his idea that the officers who did not go before the courts, acquiesced in the findings of the naval board. How did they acquiesce? They could not rebel against your law; they could not alter their position after you had chosen to retire them without a hearing. Numbers of them did not come here to complain, but some did. Many who did not complain felt aggrieved—seriously aggrieved. In my judgment, that law was destructive to the morale of the service. How can the action of those officers who did not go before the courts be an acquiescence? They might have looked to the justice of Congress in remedying them in some other mode than was prescribed in the act of 1857. There is no acquiescence on their part because they refused to go before a tribunal, not to be tried on any specific charges, either affecting their moral character, their mental capacity, or their bodily capacity; but to be tried as a matter of opinion on their whole lives, upon all subjects, on the question of relative capacity or efficiency. I cannot view those officers who did not go before the courts of inquiry as acquiescing in the justice of the position which placed them on the retired list, or dropped them from the Navy. If you are to allow the President to make selections for officers to be renominated to us who were, by the board, under the first law, deprived of their position in the Navy, I wish to extend the same benefit to all officers in the service, and I think the discretion of the President and the Senate will make a proper use of this power.

Mr. IVERSON. I was one of those Senators who believed that the policy of the original law which created the retiring board was highly improper and injudicious. I was opposed to the policy of the law, and I was much more opposed to its execution. I believe the law itself, and the execution of it, was one of the most outrageous and disgraceful proceedings ever put on the records of the country. I expressed my opinions pretty freely on this subject when the question was discussed at the last Congress. Notwithstanding my objection as to the policy of the law, and the manner of its execution by the Secretary of the Navy and the retiring board, and although my sympathies were very strongly excited in favor of the retired officers—all of them and every one of them—I cannot vote for the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, for reasons which I shall proceed to state briefly.

I make these remarks in order that I may preserve my consistency in the matter; because, as I was opposed to the whole proceeding originally, it might be supposed I was acting inconsistently if I did not throw open the door now for the restoration of those officers.

At the last session of Congress we passed a law by which the retired officers who came before us and said they were aggrieved by the action of the retiring board, were afforded an opportunity of a fair and impartial hearing before courts of inquiry. A number of them have gone before those courts. They have gone manfully and met the investigation, and they have done it in open day. The law required that they should prove their professional, moral, mental, and physical capacity for the naval service. Many of them have gone before those courts, and they have proved these things to entitle them to restoration, and I suppose many of them have been restored, or, at least, initiatory steps have been taken for their restoration. It is understood, at any rate, that the courts of inquiry have recommended many of them for restoration.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] is mistaken somewhat as to the number of the officers who have not applied to the courts. Two hundred and one officers were originally retired and dropped by the retiring board. Out of that number some have died; and I understand one hundred and twenty have gone before the naval courts for examination; so that only sixty or seventy have not gone before these courts, instead of one hundred and ten, as he stated. Over one hundred have gone before the courts, and asked for a review of the proceedings under which they suffered; and decisions have been made in their behalf, or against them. Some sixty or seventy, however, have acquiesced in the original decision of the retiring board. They have either been satisfied with the position which that board assigned them, or they have been afraid of the investigation which the law of the last Congress invited them to make. If that be the case, I think they ought to be, and are estopped, from any further promotion. If they are satisfied with the positions in which the retiring board placed them, of course there is no reason for making provision for their promotion. If they were not satisfied, but were afraid or ashamed to go before the courts of inquiry for the purpose of investigation, then I think they ought equally to be estopped.

Besides, the amendment of the Senator from Delaware would place the gentlemen who have thought proper not to go before these courts on the same footing as to claims for promotion as those who have gone before the courts. Here are sixty or seventy gentlemen who, having undergone the examination, are recommended for restoration; they have met the ordeal which the Senate and House of Representatives thought proper to propose for the trial of their claims. If the amendment be adopted those officers who acquiesced, or were afraid to encounter this investigation, will have the same right and stand precisely in the same position as those who have been before the courts. I think we ought not to put them in the same category. I think they have inferior claims, at least, to those who have gone before the courts and met the investigation manfully and openly.

Besides, if the door be thrown open for the restoration of officers who have acquiesced in the decisions of the retiring board, how is the President to investigate and find out the qualifications of these gentlemen? Mind you, the officers who have gone before the courts of inquiry, and who have been recommended for restoration, have proved their mental, professional, physical, and moral qualifications for service. If the President undertakes to restore any of the other officers, he ought to be satisfied of the mental, moral, physical, and professional capacity of the officer who applies for restoration. How is he to arrive at that conclusion? If he can satisfy himself by a process of inquiry as to the efficiency of these gentlemen, or any applicant who presents his claims to him, how is the Senate to arrive at a conclusion on the subject? Their cases must be presented here for investigation. We have to satisfy ourselves of the mental, moral, physical, and professional capacity of the applicant. How are we to do it except by instituting a process of inquiry and the examination of witnesses? It will involve a degree of responsibility and expense and trouble to the Senate, which I think the Senate will be very unwilling to encounter. For one, I deprecate any such proceeding. I think as these officers have had an opportunity of having their day in court, and have failed or neglected to avail themselves of that opportunity, they ought to be estopped.

For these reasons, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, although originally I sympathized deeply with all these officers, and if I could have wiped out the whole proceeding by a vote given here, I should have done so; but it is now too late, I think, to amend the original wrong which was done.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUNTER. I now offer this proviso to be added to the resolution:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to allow the increase of the number of officers in the active-service list, as now authorized by law.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. If I understand it, that amendment defeats the whole resolution.

Mr. HUNTER. It does not. It allows the President to nominate officers from any of these positions whenever there may be a vacancy, but it preserves the policy of the law which limited the number of officers on the active-service list of the Navy. That policy was founded with reference to the interests, not only of the country, but of the Navy. It was believed that it was proper, and indeed, necessary, to fix some limit to the number of officers in that list, in order to make promotions rapid, and in order to confine the number of officers within such limits as might be consistent with what it was politic to expend on that branch of the service. I am merely for keeping up the policy of the law and allowing the President to nominate from any of these lists whenever there shall be a vacancy.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the proviso offered by the Senator from Virginia strikes at the very best class of officers, to whom it is my purpose to extend relief. The whole effect of it, as I understand his proposition, will be to authorize the President to nominate, or to place those persons who are now dropped from the Navy, on the reserved list. But there are officers now placed upon the reserved list whose personal and professional pride has been wounded by the fact of being considered unfit to command under the colors of their country. This is a pride which deserves rather to be nursed than repressed; and it is the loftier and nobler spirit which is struck at in these cases—the man who does not ask the Government to feed him; but who, after years of honorable service, has attained a rank of which he is reluctant to be deprived. He asks that he shall be put upon the active list in order that whenever the Government chooses to order him into service, he may again walk the deck of a vessel, the proud representative of his nation. If we are merely with eleemosynary sentiment dealing out bread; if we are to take those who have been dropped or put on furlough pay, and for the sake of giving them a pittance, but little more than a pension, make this provision, the proviso is proper; but if, as I believe, in some few instances—and I think they are very few—some of the best officers of the Navy have been put on the reserved list, then, sir, I think the interest of the country and the great demands of justice require that we should open the gate and bring these officers back to the positions which they have heretofore graced.

Nor, sir, if I understand this movement, made with a financial view, will the difference of expense be great. If an officer is not in commission, but on shore, and he is waiting orders, or on leave, or on furlough, the amount of pay he will receive waiting orders on shore will be but little more than leave pay; if he be receiving leave pay, it will be exactly what he would have if on the reserved list. The only effect, then, produced is to wound his pride, and shut him out from the opportunity for active service, and to close against the country the opportunity to avail itself of his efficiency to command, if hereafter it should be required. I would rather have the resolution, I admit, with the proviso, than not to have it at all, because it would be a modicum of justice. Some few who have been dropped, after they had been worn out in the service, would be then left on a pittance to support them the balance of their days; but I think that the proviso, in every sense which goes to the pride of the Navy and to the gratitude of the country, is subject to every objection which attaches to the proposition as it now stands.

I am not one of those, Mr. President—and while I am up I will say so—who look on the proceeding, originally, as so objectionable as to justify any of the harsh terms which have been applied to it. It follows, in the course of years, that every military service requires either reorganization or the retirement of those who have become unfit for the duties of their station. I think that Congress did well to provide for the means of retiring from active service those who were no longer fit for it. I do not think it did well to provide for dropping an officer because his conduct had been disgraceful or unworthy of his profession, because that was the proper function of a court-martial. But it must happen that either despotic power is exercised, and reorganization is provided for by law, or the retirement of those who have become unfit for the service is called for by the best interests of the country. I think, therefore, that the proposition, originally, was a good one. I think it was very badly executed. The board should have heard each officer. They should have made up a separate record in each case. The officer should have been confronted with the board, and with the witnesses who appeared against him. His physical, his mental, and his moral fitness for the Navy should not have been decided upon in a closed room, with secret witnesses, and no record in future time to speak of what was done. That is my great objection to it.

Then this court of inquiry, a remedial measure, summons before it an officer who has been dropped from the rolls of the Navy, or dropped from the active list, by a secret proceeding, but they do not inform him on what charge or for what reason he has been retired or dropped. They summon him there to prove a general negative—that he is neither physically, morally, nor professionally unfit for the service. Every one knows how difficult it is to prove a general negative. Every one sees how unfair the proceeding is towards the officer; first stricken from the roll by a secret proceeding, and then summoned before an open court, to prove a general negative. Now, all that I ask of the Senate is, that when he has appeared before that open court and made a record which, upon fair investigation, justifies him in asking for restoration, he shall receive that justice at our hands. For the brief period which will elapse when each grade of the Navy may be temporarily in excess, there will be but a small increase of expenditure; but you will save the pride and you will do justice to the individual who has suffered this great wrong at our hands; for, by the form of the law, it was left to the board to see to the manner of its execution.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Mississippi seems to proceed upon the presumption that the board was wrong in its action, and that, therefore, any attempt to adhere to the original policy of the law, would do injustice to those who complain of the action of these courts. It seems to me that, as they acted under our law, it is fairer to presume prima facie that they were correct. If it be right to assume that they were not, I do not see why the privilege should not be extended to the class of persons proposed to be relieved by the Senator from Delaware, as well as those whom the Senator from Mississippi proposes to relieve. Nor do I see that it is any particular hardship on the Navy; for, as I understood, it was at their request that a limit was put on the number of officers in the active-service list. It was to make the corps more efficient; and it was to make them more efficient by holding out greater inducements and better opportunities for promotion. It is on their account, as well as that of the public service, that I desire to secure so much of the policy of the old law. I am willing that, when vacancies occur, these gentlemen shall be nominated, if the President should think proper to do so, to fill those vacancies; but I am not willing, unless Senators can show me that the original policy of the law was wrong, to increase the number which that law assigned as the proper number to be placed on the active-service list.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that I have been led into error as to his purpose. I will say to him further, with entire deference, that he does not effect his purpose by the proviso. An officer on the reserved list cannot receive promotion. There is no possibility for him ever to get on the active list. The very fact of his being on the reserved list puts him out of promotion.

Mr. HUNTER. It was to relieve that very fact that I was willing to vote for the joint resolution of the Senator from Mississippi. If we pass that, with the proviso, he still is in the line of promotion, because he can be nominated to a vacancy. As the law now stands, on his view, the President cannot nominate a man on the reserved list to fill a vacancy in the active-service list; but if his resolution be passed, the President can nominate a man on the reserved list to fill a vacancy on the active-service list. I say I am willing to do that, provided we keep within the limit originally fixed by the law, and do not increase the number of officers in the active-service list.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope the proposition of the Senator from Virginia will not be entertained by this body. Its effect will be to defeat entirely that modicum of justice which seems to have been conceded unanimously by the Senate, with one or two exceptions. Before the getting up of the unfortunate retiring board, the number of captains in the Navy was limited to sixty-eight. That board of fifteen, that secret tribunal of which you have heard, struck several captains from the list. The object was to give promotion to gentlemen who were impatient. It was the most infamous tribunal that ever disgraced any nation under the sun. It has no parallel whatever. In order to allow some modicum of justice, the two Houses of Congress agreed that the rule limiting the number of captains to sixty-eight should be relaxed so as to admit those who should be proved, on an open trial, to have been unjustly treated by the secret board. The friends of the board, by a hard struggle in open session and elsewhere, first secured the promotion of those men who had managed adroitly to put other people out and get their places. Congress said that the number should be enlarged pro tanto, so as to receive those to whom injustice had been done. This was necessary, because the confirmation of those who were promoted, by virtue of the action of the board, was pressed forward, and if the action of the board were rescinded by a subsequent court, the whole matter would be involved in difficulty. Now the Senator from Mississippi proposes to carry out this feature of the law of last year. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia, if adopted, will utterly destroy it.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not understand that the proviso which I have offered will affect the action of last session at all. The bill of last session enlarged the number. The Senator from Mississippi proposes to enlarge it further.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am aware of that; but I say the amendment destroys the principle of the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi, which I believe to be correct. It is simply to give these officers, who have been subjected to the disadvantages of which that Senator very correctly spoke, a right which other officers in the military and naval service have. Other officers, when subjected to the action of a court of inquiry or a court-martial, have a right to call for the approval or disapproval by the President of the United States of the action of the court. The President may perceive that the judgment of one of the courts of inquiry is wrong; he may be convinced that the officer is worthy to be returned into the active service of the country, and that he has been badly treated by the first board; and yet the Senator from Virginia says, by his proviso, that the President shall not redress the wrong until vacancies occur in the ordinary course of events.

When a batch of two hundred promotions was presented to us in consequence of the action of the revising board, the Senate took them all in a bunch, but now each case is to be scrutinized. The idea of the law of last year was, that if any man had been served unjustly, you would put him where he was before the wrong action took place, and this resolution only carries out that policy. In order to do this, Congress agreed to relax the rule limiting the number of officers in each grade. If that was just—and there seems to have been very little objection to it—why not give the President a further opportunity to redress the wrong by relaxing the rule still further? The proposition of the Senator from Virginia strikes at the principle of the measure, extorted, I may say, by the general demand of the country and by the iniquity of the original proceeding, from the Senate and House of Representatives at the last session, and almost unanimously acquiesced in by Congress.

No one of the twelve or thirteen hundred officers in our military and naval service can have the slightest censure passed on him without being subjected to this general law, which has obtained from the foundation of the Republic. Oftentimes there is first a court of inquiry, and then a court-martial; but the sentence must be approved by the President of the United States before it can take effect. We are now simply amending a defect in the last law on this subject, and requiring this proceeding to be subject to the approval of the President, as in all other cases, by the general law of the land.

I was opposed to having as many as sixty-eight captains. I was opposed to the promotions made by the action of the naval board, because I thought they gave us twice as many post captains as we ought to have in the service. If those promotions had not been made we should not have had half this difficulty. It was then insisted by the chairman of the Naval Committee that we had not enough officers in any of the grades, but needed a larger number.

He stated that the public service demanded it. I differed from him on that point, and I thought the places should be kept vacant, in order to allow the restoration of those who had been improperly displaced. If any one is to be kept back, let it be the man who has obtained a place from which another has been improperly dismissed. If an officer has been treated with injustice, if he has been wronged by a secret tribunal, if the President and Senate believe his record entitles him to restoration to the active-service list, let him be restored; and if any one is to be displaced, let it be the man who wrongfully holds the position of the officer who has been improperly driven from the service of the country.

Mr. HUNTER. A very few words will, I think, enable me to show that there is nothing in my amendment inconsistent with the principle of the joint resolution. As I understand it, the resolution was introduced because, in the opinion of the Senator from Mississippi and others, the President cannot nominate from these ranks to the active-service list, for the reason that the law forbids it; and that might very well be the foundation of such a resolution. There is another class of opinion here, which holds that the President can, under his general constitutional power, fill vacancies in the active list by appointments from the reserved list. It is to reconcile these opinions and to effect what all agree may properly be done to enable the President to fill vacancies by appointments from the reserved list, that I am willing to see this resolution introduced and passed. There may be a further purpose on the part of the Senator from Mississippi, with which I do not sympathize, and that is, to allow those who have failed before the second board to get another chance for a trial.

Mr. TOOMBS. Not a trial.

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir, it is another chance for a trial. It is a trial before the President. It is an appeal from the second court of inquiry to the President. I voted for the bill under which these second courts of inquiry were held. I thought it was an act of justice due to the officers who had been retired, that they should be heard; but when I voted for that bill, I supposed the findings of these courts of inquiry would be final and conclusive. It seems, however, that there are many here who are still dissatisfied with these findings. I am willing to say that the President may, notwithstanding the law, do what, in the opinion of some gentlemen, he has a right to do, under the Constitution. If he does not increase the number to which the law has limited the officers of the Navy, I see no reason why he may not nominate to vacancies from any of these lists. To that extent I am willing to go, and I will consent to the passage of this resolution because, under the existing laws there are some, among them my friend from Mississippi, who think the President will be restricted from making such nominations unless the existing restrictions be pro tanto repealed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The position of the Senator from Georgia is plausible, but I think it is unsound. He assumes that this proceeding is in the nature of a court-martial or court of inquiry, and that it necessarily involves, not only the examination, but the approval of the President. I differ from him on that point altogether. If the bill which we passed at the last session had provided that, in case the President did not approve the finding of the board in any individual case, he might, nevertheless, nominate the officer to the Senate, the case would have presented a different aspect. The argument of the Senator from Georgia is founded on that idea. He says this is only carrying out the principle of that bill; and he therefore assumes that, when that bill was passed, it was intended that the President should have the power of reappointing such persons as might be recommended by the courts for reappointment to the active list; that he should also have the power, if he did not approve the findings of the courts, to reappoint to active service those whom the courts decided ought to remain in the position in which they were first placed.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think that is the true construction of the act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think differently from the Senator from Georgia. If that is the true legal construction of the act the President can do it now, and there is no necessity for passing this resolution to enable him to do it. The bill would have presented itself to my apprehension in a very different shape, with a very different meaning, if it had said what the Senator now assumes that it meant, to wit, that the President should have power to review all the proceedings of these courts. I hold that it was not intended to give him any such power. The board provided for by the original law placed some officers on the reserved list, and some on the furlough list, and some it struck off the rolls of the Navy altogether. The President, then, had power to approve or disapprove its action. Having approved it, the matter was settled so far as the officers were concerned. Then we passed the act of 1857, not to give the President power to replace these gentlemen in the Navy except in case of a certain result. What was that result? It was that a court to be appointed in pursuance of the provisions of that act, should find that they ought to be restored to active service, and their position upon the furlough list or leave-of-absence list changed. Now the Senator assumes that the object of the act was not only to give the President power to act in restoring these officers in pursuance of the finding of a court, but that it was also to give the President power to act in opposition to the finding of the court. No such construction I apprehend can be well founded. If the construction of the Constitution be as is contended, that the President has not power to fill a vacancy by the appointment of an officer on the reserved list in case he should recover from his disability, I might be willing to grant that power; but I am not willing to give him power to override these decisions which have been made consecutively, one after the other, in opposition, as I contend, to the true intent and meaning of the act passed last year.

Mr. HAMLIN called for the yeas and nays on Mr. HUNTER's amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. MASON. I wish to say a very few words before giving my vote for this amendment. Ever since the action of the board of fifteen was promulgated to the country, the legislation by which we have made attempts to remedy it, I think, has thrown us into still greater difficulties. I was one of those who believed that the action of that board inflicted a vital blow on the character of our Navy. I have never yet seen reason to change that belief. At the last session, it was the pleasure of the two Houses, by the law of 1857, to endeavor to repair some of the mischiefs which resulted; and in that endeavor, it was considered by the friends of that measure, of whom I was not one, that it was necessary to enlarge the number of officers in the Navy, pro hac vice, in order to admit the operation of that law. It was a necessary expedient, I dare say, but a very clumsy one; one that had been entailed on us, however, by the action of the board.

Now, as I understand, the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi is to give power to the President to nominate to the Senate for restoration to the active list officers who have gone before these courts, and have been rejected by them. I do not doubt that the President possesses this power without any legislation on our part; but still I should have no objection to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi, unless it again enlarges the number of the officers of the Navy. Certainly no one who reasons as I do can doubt that the operation of the retiring board was one which the board thought necessary to thin the ranks. There were too many officers for the ships then, and in consequence of that, as far as I could see, they sought every occasion against every officer of the Navy if possible to disable him and put him aside, in order that they might get promotion.

Now, in the endeavor of the last Congress to remedy the evil inflicted on the Navy by that retiring board, they found themselves under the necessity of enlarging the number of officers, already too large; and if the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi carries, without the restraint placed on it by the limitation proposed by my colleague, the effect of it will then be to again enlarge it. For these reasons—although I shall vote for the resolution of the Senator—I cannot agree to enlarge the number of officers.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. My colleague [Mr. SEBASTIAN] has paired off with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. JONES.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 24, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Clay, Collamer, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Hamlin, Hammond, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Mason, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Foot, Green, Gwin, Hale, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Kennedy, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Toombs, and Wright—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLAY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Biggs, Clay, Collamer, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Hamlin, Hammond, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Mason, Slidell, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Foot, Green, Gwin, Hale, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Kennedy, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Toombs, and Wright—22.

So the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time and passed.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, stating that he had received from Samuel Medary, Governor of the Territory of Minnesota, a copy of the constitution of Minnesota, together with an abstract of the votes polled for and against said constitution, at the election held in that Territory on the second Tuesday of October last, certified by the Governor in due form; which, on motion of Mr. DOUGLAS, was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 22, estimates for the improvement of certain harbors on Lake Erie.

Mr. STUART. I move that the report be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and be printed.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to say beforehand, as a protection to this Secretary of War, and with some regard for his predecessor, that I hope the fact of his answering a call, and sending in these estimates, will not hereafter be quoted against him as a recommendation for these works. I heard no recommendation in his letter.

The report was referred to the Committee on Commerce; and the motion to print was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REGISTER TO BARK JEHU.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senate to take up two little bills, which were reported by me last week from the Committee on Commerce—one to authorize the issue of a register to the bark Jehu, and the other to authorize the issue of a register to the steamer Fearless. I will say that they are reported unanimously by the committee, and they are approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. There is no objection, that I can see, to their passage. I hope the Senate will pass them, as I am told, with respect, at least, to the bark Jehu, that she is waiting in the port of Boston for a register to be granted before she sails.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 50) to authorize the issue of a register to the bark Jehu was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its object is expressed in its title.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGISTER TO THE STEAMER FEARLESS.

The bill (S. No. 51) to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer Fearless was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the issue of a register to the steamer Fearless, under that name, a foreign-built vessel, and now owned in part by J. M. Estelle, of San Francisco, on satisfactory proof to the Secretary of the Treasury that the steamer is wholly owned by citizens of the United States, and that the repairs put upon her in the United States, while thus owned, are equal to three fourths of her cost when repaired.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARREST OF WILLIAM WALKER.

Mr. MASON. I wish to say to the Senate that if there be any desire on the part of Senators to debate the motion which I made on Thursday, to refer the President's message in relation to Walker and Nicaragua to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I shall not now insist on the reference; but I move to take up that motion with a view to have it acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the next business in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the message of the President of the United States in relation to Nicaragua be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MASON. I have no desire whatever to debate that matter, but have refrained from it. I with very great deference and respect submit to the Senate that it would be better perhaps to allow the reference to be made, and let the debate, if one is to arise, be on the principles announced in the report of the committee. If there is to be debate, I will not, of course, insist on the motion at this hour.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 11, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. B. N. Brown.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the laws and journals of the Legislature of the Territory of Nebraska; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

Also, a communication transmitting copies of the accounts of persons charged with the disbursement of goods, moneys, and effects, for the benefit of Indians, from the 1st of July, 1856, to the 30th of June, 1857; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the War Department, in answer to a resolution of the House of 4th of January, 1858, calling for the last report of Lieutenant Colonel J. D. Graham, on the harbors of Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CHILDREN OF JOHN NEIL.

The SPEAKER presented a bill from the Court of Claims, which had been overlooked in the report of bills presented several days ago, for the relief of the surviving children of John Neil, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

CALL OF THE STATES.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was on the motion submitted on Monday last by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] to suspend the rules for the introduction of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the States be again called for the introduction of bills and resolutions to which no objection shall be made; and that upon such call it shall be in order for any member to introduce more than one such bill or resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to modify the resolution, so that it shall read as follows; and I move to suspend the rules, to permit me to offer it:

Resolved, That the States and Territories be called, beginning with the State of New York, for the introduction of bills; and that each member be permitted to introduce, on motion for leave, without debate, as many bills as he desires, for reference only, and such resolutions as may not be objected to.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 46.

Mr. PHILLIPS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COBB. I ask whether an objection to a bill introduced under this resolution would not carry it over? I wish to know whether this rule does not apply to bills as well as resolutions?

The SPEAKER. It does not, as the Chair understands it. The Chair understands that, under the resolution as modified by the gentleman from Ohio, if objection is made to the introduction of a bill, the question will be put and decided by a majority of the House, on a motion for leave.

Mr. KEITT. I wish to inquire whether a disposition upon the part of any member to debate a bill would not carry it over?

The SPEAKER. It would not, in the opinion of the Chair, if the resolution should be adopted.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 96, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Comins, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Fenton, Gartrell, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Greenwood, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hoard, Howard, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Samuel S. Marshall, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Quitman, Reagan, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bliss, Bocoock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Caskie, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Covode, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gillis, Goode, Granger, Gregg, Hickman, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maclay, McQueen, Maynard, Montgomery, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Rufin, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stevenson, Talbot, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollicoffer—86.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, stated that his colleague, Mr. UNDERWOOD, was detained from the House by sickness in his family.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I rise to a privileged question. I wish to submit a report from the Committee on Printing; and I hope the House will receive it, as I am compelled to leave the city this evening.

The SPEAKER. The report the gentleman wishes to make would not, in the opinion of the Chair, be a question of higher privilege than the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to suspend the rules.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I thought I was recognized by the Chair before the gentleman from Pennsylvania was.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will yield the floor for the gentleman to introduce his report.

PRINTING OF COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Printing, then introduced the following report, and upon it demanded the previous question:

The Committee on Printing upon the part of the House, to whom it was referred to inquire into the expediency of printing ten thousand extra copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1857, report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed five thousand extra copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1857; three thousand copies for distribution by the Coast Survey office, and two thousand copies for the use of the members of the House; and that the same be printed and bound with the plates, in quarto form; and that the printing of said plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I will withdraw it for a moment, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. PHELPS. There is certain phraseology in that resolution which I do not like. We have a Superintendent of Public Printing, as well as a Committee on Printing, and I am unwilling to devolve the duties of the Superintendent of Public Printing, and of that committee, upon the chief of the Coast Survey. I desire, therefore, to have the words "that the printing of said plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey" stricken out.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I cannot consent to the modification which the gentleman desires.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask what is the number of extra copies of this document usually printed?

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. The usual number of extra copies has been ten thousand. With that number, I have myself been applied to by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey to furnish him with names of parties in my district, to whom he should send a portion of these books. They have been sent there; but they are of no more use to my constituents than so much blank paper. This resolution cuts down the number to one half of what has been printed heretofore. The Committee on Printing thought proper to print that number which is necessary, and to leave out that number which is wholly unnecessary; and of the number ordered, to throw the larger proportion into the hands of the Coast Survey office, in order that they should be properly distributed, and to the greatest good of the country.

And, sir, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] I have to say that the resolution does not in the least remove the superintendence of this printing from the supervision of the Superintendent of Public Printing. It requires only that the printing of the plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, who is the only man who can judge of the work. Moreover, this report is made upon consultation with the Superintendent of Public Printing, and with the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, and is satisfactory to both. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to propound another inquiry to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the call for the previous question for that purpose?

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. PHELPS. What will be the probable cost for printing this work? The reason for my making the inquiry is this: the Committee of Ways and Means have been called on to provide, in a bill for the appropriation of money to supply the deficiencies for the printing of documents ordered by the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses. The committee have not been put in possession of the exact amount of money necessary to defray the expenses for paper, printing, engraving, and lithographing; but this much we do know, that there will be due to the Public Printers of the two preceding Congresses, when they shall have executed the work which has been ordered for printing, paper, engraving, and lithographing, a sum little short of one million dollars, in addition to what has been already appropriated for the purposes of printing. The estimates which have been submitted thus far, amount to nearly seven hundred thousand dollars.

I therefore desire to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee whether he is prepared to state to the House the cost of this work? I am very glad to see that he has reported in favor of a reduction of the number of copies, because at the last Congress we ordered too large an amount of printing. I agree with him in the opinion he has expressed, that this document is of little use to the interior of the country.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I will answer the gentleman's question, for these facts ought to be known to the House. The printing of the Coast Survey report for the last Congress cost $3 75 per volume. This was the entire cost for paper, printing, and engraving. It is one of the most expensive works published by Congress. The printing of five thousand copies will cost the Government, according to our estimates, (and they are only approximate,) for material, plates, and printing, the round sum of $20,000. By this resolution we save to the Government the sum of $20,000, which would be required in addition, if ten thousand copies were ordered.

So far as the report of the Coast Survey is concerned, I think that it was correctly stated by the gentleman from Missouri, that it was useless to the interior. Therefore, why shall we not cut down the number of extra copies? The proper estimates will be furnished by the Superintendent of Public Printing to the proper quarter, and then provision can be made for appropriations to defray the expenses of the work. It is not part of the business of the Committee on Printing to furnish estimates to the House for this work, unless called upon to do so. We have approximated it as nearly as we can, and estimate that the printing of five thousand copies will cost $20,000. I call for the previous question, and I must hold on to it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it for an inquiry.

Mr. MORGAN. I also have an inquiry to make. Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I decline to withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it in order to move that the resolution be laid upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I submit that motion.

Mr. BURNETT demanded tellers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish for information. Is not the number of this document which is usually ordered to be printed thirteen hundred and seventy-five?

The SPEAKER. The usual number is ten thousand.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. No, sir; that is the extra number. It is desirable to have information on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The Chair has given all the information he had.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it in order to ask a question?

The SPEAKER. Of whom?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What is the usual number printed anyhow? The extra number we know.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. Fifteen hundred and thirty. They have been ordered already.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. We get that number in any event.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. SMITH, of Virginia; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 84, nays 122; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Andrews, Avery, Bennett, Boyce, Burnett, Caskie, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Cockerill, Cragin, Burton Craig, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Mississippi, Dodd, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Garnett, Gillis, Goode, Goodwin, Greenwood, Gregg, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kellogg, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Murray, Olin, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Potter, Powell, Reagan, Raffin, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, William Stewart, Tripp, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, Winslow, Wood, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Bliss, Bocoock, Bowie, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clingman, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leach, Leidy, Lovejoy, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Maynard, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Niblack, Nichols, Palmer, Phillips, Pike, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Woodson, and Wortendyke—122.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Pending the above call,

Mr. KEITT stated that his colleague, Mr. MILES, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. TALBOT said that if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he would have voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER stated that the question recurred on seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw the call for the previous question until I move an amendment to substitute ten thousand for five thousand, and afford the House an opportunity to vote between both numbers.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I decline to withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Then I hope the House will vote down the proposition.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it in order to ask for a division of the resolution—that the vote be taken first on that portion ordering extra copies for the use of the House; and next on that part ordering extra copies for the use of the Coast Survey?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution; and the gentleman from Tennessee will indicate where he supposes the division of the question can be made.

The resolution was reported.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The resolution provides for the printing of a certain number of copies for the use of the members of this House, and a certain number for the use of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, or for the Coast Survey office. I wish to know if the resolution could be divided, so as to take a separate vote upon the part which relates to the members of the House, and a separate vote on the copies for the Coast Survey office?

Mr. FLORENCE. And that is pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. It is not divisible any way, especially as the previous question has been called.

Mr. FLORENCE. I think the gentleman had better withdraw the demand for the previous question, and get his resolution right.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is too right now.

Mr. FLORENCE. It does not suit me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the resolution is not divisible, for the reason that, if the first part be rejected by the vote of the House, there will be nothing upon which the second part can be construed or interpreted.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I move to lay the motion for the previous question upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. Is it in order, before the previous question is seconded, to move to amend the resolution by a motion to strike out?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The question is upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FAULKNER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FAULKNER and NICHOLS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 70; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I hope, by unanimous consent, there will be a recount.

Mr. CLINGMAN. There is obviously a quorum present.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn. We can test it upon that motion.

The question was taken; and there were, on a division—ayes 4, noes 160; a quorum.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question, and the tellers resumed their places.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will it be in order to suspend the rules, and to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, as the House is now considering a privileged matter.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The rule provides that it shall be in order at any time to move to suspend the rules, and for the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the motion would not be in order pending the consideration of this report. It is a privileged matter from the Committee on Printing, which committee has the right to report at any time; and the right to report involves, of course, the necessity of disposing of the report.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would it be in order for the gentleman who introduced the resolution to modify it by striking out the last sentence of it, in reference to the Superintendent of the Coast Survey? If he does so, I do not think there will be any difficulty about the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that no modification by the gentleman himself would be in order, inasmuch as the resolution is a report from a committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the only thing which gives trouble in adopting the resolution.

Mr. PHELPS. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SMITH] to withdraw his call for the previous question, in order that I may submit an amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. And then call the previous question?

Mr. PHELPS. And then I will call the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object to this debate.

The call for the previous question was not withdrawn.

The tellers resumed their places; and reported—ayes 81, noes 67.

So the previous question was seconded. The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 79, nays 116; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Barksdale, Bliss, Bocock, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burns, Chaffee, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Comins, Corning, Cox, Cragin, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dinnick, Durfee, Edie, Elliott, Farnsworth, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hickman, Horton, Keitt, Kelsey, Kilgore, Lamar, Landy, Leach, Lovejoy, Maclay, McQueen, Maynard, Morrill, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Wade, Walton, Ward, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, and Wood—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, Burroughs, Case, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingan, Cobb, Cockrell, Colfax, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dodd, Dowdell, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Giddings, Goode, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Pottle, Powell, Ready, Rufin, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippie, Waldron, Warren, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, Winslow, Winslow, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—116.

So the resolution was disagreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The House divided; and the motion to reconsider was laid on the table—ayes 90, noes 75.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the gentleman to give way to enable me to introduce a bill upon which the public service demands speedy action, for reference only.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If it is for reference only, and will not give rise to debate, I will yield.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to increase the military establishment of the United States by the addition of five new regiments.

Mr. MORGAN and others objected.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move to suspend the rules. I repeat that I only desire to introduce the bill for reference.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 113, nays 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocock, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingan, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edie, Edmundson, English, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippie, Ward, Warren, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zollicoffer—113.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Atkins, Bennett, Bingham, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Crawford, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Elliott, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Seward, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburne, Wilson, Wood, and John V. Wright—95.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by J. BUCHANAN HENRY, his Private Secretary.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Before the question is taken upon that motion, I hope the gentleman will give way to have the message, just sent in from the President of the United States, taken up, read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have twice yielded for other business which has occupied the House for the last two hours, and I cannot yield further. Previous to the vote being taken on my motion, however, I desire to move the previous question upon the resolution submitted by me on Thursday last, to close debate in committee on the President's message.

CLOSE OF DEBATE ON THE MESSAGE.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman brings up the following resolution for the action of the House:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the annual message of the President of the United States, shall cease in one hour after its consideration is resumed, (if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion upon the same;) and the committee shall then proceed to vote upon such propositions as may be pending, or may be offered in connection therewith, and shall then report it to the House, with such propositions as may have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Since the adjournment I have been appealed to by gentlemen on all sides to extend the time—

Mr. SEWARD. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I object to the gentleman making any statement.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to modify the resolution so as to make it close debate at three o'clock to-morrow, and now demand the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think this resolution is offered prematurely.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, sir, I think this resolution has been offered prematurely, and I make that motion.

The House proceeded to divide upon the motion; and there were one hundred and one in the affirmative.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the demand for the previous question had not been made when the gentleman from Pennsylvania moved to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I submit, therefore, that the resolution is not before the House, but that it fell pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. If there was anything in the point of order or suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, it was obviated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania modifying his resolution, and then demanding the previous question. The modification of the resolution made it the same as if he had offered a new resolution.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to submit a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GROW. If debate is not in order, I shall object to the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. WARREN. I wished to say that inasmuch as— [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to know if it would be competent for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to modify his resolution, so as to close debate at one o'clock on Thursday next?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I hope he will so modify the resolution. That will satisfy gentlemen on all sides.

Mr. WARREN. That is precisely the proposition I was about to make. I hope the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will adopt it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will so modify my resolution; and again call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had no right to modify his resolution while the vote was being taken to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to modify his resolution at any time before the vote has been taken.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to modify his resolution so as to close debate on Thursday next, at one o'clock?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With that modification I am satisfied, and will withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. GROW. I renew the motion.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I make this point of order: that while the House is dividing the gentleman has no right to modify his resolution, and that no other motion is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to modify his resolution at any time before the result is announced, according to the uniform practice of the House.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 89, nays 118; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Daves, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edmundson, Eustis, Farnsworth, Foster, Garnett, Gilman, Gilmer, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Olin, Palmer, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Boccock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garrett, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hickman, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Kilgore, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Macclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miller, Moore, Montgomery, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phelps, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Rufin, Russell, Sandiege, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Smith, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Whitey, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zoll-coffer—118.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. BLISS called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. LETCHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurring upon the motion that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] moving the reference of a certain portion of the message to a special committee; and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROESBECK] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio does not at this late hour care to go on with his remarks, and appeals to the committee to rise, in order that he may have an opportunity to speak to-morrow. I have risen, with his consent, to move that the committee rise.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman will not press that motion. If the gentleman from Ohio does not wish to proceed this evening, I presume the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means could call up the pension appropriation bill, or the Indian appropriation bill, which are bills more of form than anything else, and we can probably pass one of those bills this evening.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If it be the pleasure of the committee, by unanimous consent, my colleague can have the floor in the morning, and some one else can speak this evening.

Mr. BOCOCK. That would be satisfactory, and any other gentleman who chose to do so could speak this afternoon. If it be the unanimous agreement that the gentleman from Ohio shall have the floor in the morning, I will withdraw my motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. If the motion be withdrawn, the gentleman from Ohio will perhaps be recognized to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. If the gentleman from Ohio is indisposed to proceed with his remarks this evening, I will, if he will yield to me, consume a few moments of the time of the committee with some remarks which I desire to make.

Mr. BOCOCK. I can make no condition with any particular gentleman. If it is the unanimous consent of the committee that the gentleman from Ohio shall have the floor in the morning, I will then unconditionally withdraw my motion to rise.

Mr. GROESBECK. Mr. Chairman, I will state that if it be the pleasure of the House to hear me this afternoon; I have no doubt that I am quite as well prepared to proceed now as to-morrow.

Several MEMBERS. Go on now.

Mr. BOCOCK. It is proper to state that I made the motion to rise after consultation with the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Ohio yields the floor to the gentleman from Arkansas, or any other gentleman, it is probable that the Chair would recognize him to-morrow. That is as far as the Chair can go.

Mr. BOCOCK. I withdraw the motion that the committee rise.

THE NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Mr. GROESBECK. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be the disposition of the committee to continue its session, and, therefore, I do not know but I should prefer to go on now. I am greatly obliged to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCOCK] for making the suggestion he did. I was willing he should do it; not on my own account, but because I apprehended that the House had become weary. If it be the pleasure of the House that we shall proceed in the discussion of this question now, I suppose I am quite as well prepared as I will be to-morrow.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I would suggest that my colleague speak from the Clerk's desk. We can then better hear what he has to say.

Mr. GROESBECK. I am very much obliged to my colleague for that suggestion; but it is rather too conspicuous a position for me to take just now. I prefer to speak from my own desk, in the hope that I may be able to make myself heard.

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, in the remarks I shall proceed to make, to present my views of the policy of this Government in regard to Central America, or how we should proceed in that direction. I may be permitted to say that I trust that I appreciate the importance of the transit route, and all other legitimate enterprises that have been begun, or have excited inquiry in that direction. I wish to say at the outset, sir, that I agree in the views which have been expressed upon the particular expedition of William Walker, and with the views of the President in regard to his duty to enforce the laws as he finds them. I agree with him heartily and fully—just as fully as he has expressed himself in his annual and the special messages.

And I wish to say further, at the outset, that I concur in the views which have been expressed by the President in regard to his right to break up the expedition of William Walker; if not in the precise manner in which it has been done, certainly to break it up, and to apply all the power of the Government which he did apply, and to go to sea to do so if it were necessary.

I may be allowed to say, according to my judgment, this is no volunteer performance upon the part of this Administration. If I am right in what I have read, if I may rely upon the letters of the Secretary of State, to be found in the information sent to the Senate, the General Government has been called upon to interfere with this expedition; and I think I may venture to say that never, since the time when Aaron Burr meditated a military expedition against Mexico, until this hour, has the Government been so harassed as it has been by this same William Walker. I do not intend, in what I say, to cast any aspersions upon his character. I do not intend to call him a traitor, for that he is not. I do not intend to call him a pirate, for such we do not believe him to be. I intend to call him by no name; but I do intend, Mr. Chairman, if it be in my power, to vindicate the action of the Administration, and to show that it was right in putting down that expedition.

What has the Administration done? They have, upon the coast of Nicaragua, if you please, taken up those men who had departed from the jurisdiction of the United States, and brought them home. There was no cruelty in the performance; it was done in the very best manner in which it could be done; and it was right that the Government should bring the men, from Walker down, back to the jurisdiction from which they went. It would not have been right to have left them there; for that was not consistent with his duty to break up the expedition. It would not have been right to have landed them upon any other shore. He was exactly right in bringing them back, in order to prevent the carrying on of that expedition—exactly right in bringing them back to the territory of the United States.

They are here; and now the question briefly to consider is, had the Government, in the first place, the right to cross the line of the marine league from our own shores, to go out upon the Gulf, if you please, for the purpose of breaking up this expedition? I understand the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT,] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who have addressed themselves to this question, to maintain that, by the law of 1818, there is a limitation of the jurisdiction of the President in the exercise of the power which is confided to him. And, furthermore, I understand that those gentlemen, in making the proposition that the Government had not the right to cross the line of the marine league, do so by virtue of the provisions of that law alone.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word upon the subject before I proceed to consider the terms of that law. By the law of nations there is no doubt that it is the duty of this Government to keep the peace with all other nations; and that it is the duty of this Government to break up combinations of its own citizens who have actually started upon expeditions to violate the peace of other nations. As far back as 1793, in the first Administration of our Government—that of Washington—we find that, without regard to legislative enactments, before any law upon the subject was passed, our Government acted under the law of nations, and asserted their duty to be just about what is now set forth under the act of 1818. The proclamation of the President, of that time, the correspondence of the Secretary of State, Mr. Jefferson, and all the documents upon that subject, show that the General Government, without legislation, as one of the family of nations, considered herself under obligation to prevent the carrying on of military expeditions from the shores of the United States against countries with which we were at peace.

I furthermore claim—although I cannot in the time allotted to me go into a detailed discussion of the subject—that, without legislation, by the single authority of the law of nations, this Government should have the right, if you please, to go out beyond the marine league for the purpose of preserving its peace, and its own obligations of neutrality. As I understand it, the sea is no sanctuary for crime. What law is it, what principle of the law of nations is it, and where do you find the authority under which a violator of our laws has impunity for his crime, if he can only get beyond a marine league from our shores? If he get into another country, we cannot enter that country to take him without consent; but why may we not take him on the sea, where our jurisdiction, though held in common with other nations, is undoubted? No other nation upon the earth can touch him if he be a citizen of the United States, and committed the crime within her territory. They dare not touch him. The crime must be punished where it is committed; and, according to the doctrine which has been here asserted, as I understand it, it therefore follows that if we cannot cross the line of the marine league in order to lay our hands upon those who have violated our laws, the sea becomes a sanctuary for crime. Mr. Chairman, if there be an American merchant ship in mid-ocean, and a murder should be committed upon that vessel, we would have the right to take the citizen who had committed the murder, and bring him home for trial. Will any one doubt that proposition? Clearly not; and, in doing it, it seems to me we are called upon to cross thousands of miles of ocean not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. We do it daily; and we have the right to do it. But, sir, as I said before, in this stage of the discussion I will not trespass upon the attention of the committee by a discussion of the general subject of the laws of nations.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the point in question. General Washington had asserted, and Thomas Jefferson, his Secretary of State, had asserted, the right of the General Government, without legislation upon the subject, to prevent the carrying on of these expeditions. They did, in pursuance of that right, proceed to break up such expeditions, and in some instances inflicted punishment upon those who had embarked in them.

In order to reconcile all doubts upon the subject, however, in order to put it beyond the possibility of a doubt; in order that the duty of the Government might not be the subject of question during his Administration, with his approbation, a law was passed defining the obligations of neutrality of the United States. I do not intend to turn to that law; but I will remark that, in the sections which are now under consideration of the law of 1818, the provisions are precisely the same as those of the law of 1794.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us proceed to the consideration of some of these provisions. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT,] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] said that the President of the United States, in employing the land and naval forces, cannot pass the line of a marine league from our shores. They claim it by virtue of the seventh section of the act of 1818. I understand these gentlemen to base their proposition upon the rule of interpretation which they apply to that section of the law alone. What are the provisions of that section? In the first place, let us notice section six. It provides:

"That if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are [at] peace, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $3,000, and imprisoned not more than three years."

"That if ANY person" within the territory set on foot the expedition. I refer to the particular language made use of here, in order to obviate any possible objection which may be raised in reference to the fact that William Walker may not be a citizen of the United States. Admit, for the present, that he is a Nicaraguan. It matters not whether he be Nicaraguan, Englishman, Frenchman, or of any other country, if any one within the jurisdiction of the United States get up, or set on foot, a military expedition of this kind, he is just as responsible to the law as if he were a citizen of the United States; and the law will punish him, unless, as in the case of the recent English ambassador, his person is rendered inviolable by the law of nations. In that case we may order or request his recall. But, sir, whether they be Nicaraguans, Englishmen, Frenchmen—no matter whence they may come—they are just as amenable to this law as if they were American citizens; all in our land must respect the law.

I now come to the proposition which I understand to be relied on principally by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.] It is said that, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, to prevent the carrying on of these expeditions, the President cannot empower the naval forces to go outside the line of the marine league. The seventh section provides as follows:

"The district courts shall take cognizance of complaints, by whomsoever instituted, in cases of captures made within the waters of the United States, or within a marine league of the coast or shores thereof."

I submit to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] himself, that he has entirely misapprehended the nature and meaning of that section. What does it mean? It means this and no more: that if any foreign Power come within the jurisdiction of the United States in pursuit of a prize, and make a capture; the district court of the United States will take jurisdiction of that capture. The word is "capture," not "seizure," a word having in law a technical signification, and applied to the taking of a vessel by a belligerent as a prize. Furthermore, "the district court shall take cognizance of complaints, by whomsoever instituted," showing that it is a civil proceeding, for if it were a criminal one it would be conducted in the name only of the United States. Furthermore, I submit to the gentleman from Georgia, that this is made plainer by the next section, under which this authority is to be exercised. After the crimes mentioned in this act have been defined, section eight proceeds to declare in what cases and for what purposes the General Government may call out the land and naval forces. And, sir, it enumerates them case by case, and, among others, it enumerates the one that is referred to in section seven.

Let me call your particular attention to this point. "And in every case of the capture of a ship or vessel within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States, as before defined," he may call out these forces to enforce the neutrality laws of the United States in behalf of those "within her jurisdiction or protection," asserting a well-recognized doctrine, that to the extent of the marine league from the coast the authority and jurisdiction of each nation is exclusive. And, therefore, if a vessel come within the marine league, it is within the protection of the United States. But let us go further:

"In every such case, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval force for the purpose of taking possession of and detaining such ship or vessel?"

Now notice what follows:—
—"with her prize or prizes."

This shows beyond a doubt the meaning which was intended to be attached to section seven, upon which so much reliance has been placed.

The section proceeds to state other purposes for which he may use such force:

"In order to the execution of the prohibitions and penalties of this act?"

And what further?

"—and for the restoration of the prize or prizes in all cases in which restoration shall have been awarded."

There is no room, with this language before us, to doubt that the meaning of section seven of the neutrality act is nothing more or less than this: a belligerent shall not invade the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. If she make a capture within that exclusive jurisdiction the United States will preserve her obligations of neutrality, will take jurisdiction of the capture in her district courts, will award the prize to the person from whom it has been taken within her jurisdiction, or if rightfully taken will allow the captor to proceed on his way with his prize. That is all it means; and I would ask the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] in whose judgment in such matters I have been led to have great confidence, whether he, upon a further consideration of the question, believes that this section seven contains in it any limitation as to the jurisdiction or field which may be occupied by the naval force in the suppression of such expeditions?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Does the gentleman wish an answer now?

Mr. GROESBECK. Just as you please.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have not changed any opinions I have expressed on this question. I have never entertained the idea that that section had any other meaning than that which the gentleman gives it; but I stated that in that section there was a definition of the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. GROESBECK. It is the impression which the gentleman's argument made that I wish to obviate by dwelling upon this particular section. I understand him now, not to claim that section seven limits the President in the employment of the naval force to the marine league. Very well. I have other authorities to cite; but that particular view of the case seems to be abandoned.

But how does it stand when section seven is out of the way? The line of the marine league, for all purposes of inquiry as to how far the President may go in the exercise of this power confided to him to break up the expedition, is obliterated, and no limit or restriction can be found in the act. Where, then, by what enactment, by what principle of the law of nations, does the gentleman hold the President to the marine league in the exercise of this authority? It is not in this act, that is certain; but the law says do it; break up the expedition; prevent its being carried on. The command is, do it; and no limitations are imposed. Nowhere does it say, "thus far shalt thou go and no further." In the exercise of that authority it therefore seems to me entirely plain that we may go wherever the United States has jurisdiction, and is not a trespasser.

Let us look a little further. What is its language when it comes to enjoin upon the President the breaking up of such an expedition? It does not say to him "You may employ the naval force to prevent the setting the enterprise on foot, or you may employ the naval force to prevent the beginning of it." That is not it. Or, "you may employ the naval force to prevent the providing of means for carrying it on." That is not it; but, as if reserving the exercise of this high power to the last moment, as if not contemplating that it should be used in the beginning of the enterprise, the language of the section is: "You may use this authority to prevent, not the setting on foot, not the mere providing the means for it, but the carrying on." That is the language of the law; the carrying on after it is begun, after it is set on foot, after it is made up. It is in this stage of the expedition we find the direction to the President to come forward with this extraordinary power to prevent the carrying on of the expedition. And is it not being carried on after it gets outside the marine league?

Mr. Chairman, allow me, on this subject, to say that I understand it to be the law in this country that the President may, in these cases, go beyond the marine league for the purpose of preserving our neutrality. In 11 Wheaton, page 42, exactly this language is to be found in a decision of Justice Story in the case of the Marianna Flora. Justice Story, in the course of his decision, remarks that—"It is true that it has been held in the courts of this country that American ships offending against our laws, and foreign ships, in like manner offending within our jurisdiction, may afterwards be pursued and seized upon the ocean rightfully, and brought into our courts for adjudication."

Furthermore, this has been done without any condemnation of the Administration which did it. If my recollection serves me, it was done during the administration of Mr. Fillmore. At that time they ordered a part of the naval force to the neighborhood of the coast of Cuba to prevent the landing of an expedition supposed to be carried on in violation of the statute under consideration.

We have, if I am right in this, the example of our own country; we have the language of our courts upon it; and we have the law of nations, giving us a common jurisdiction upon the ocean—concurrent, but not suspended—which is as rightly exercised, if it do not interfere with the rights of other nations, as if exercised within our territory. We have all these to authorize our Government to cross the line of the marine league for the preservation of our peace and the protection of our neutrality.

What then, Mr. Chairman? I take it upon myself to say that the President is right in his doctrine that he can go to sea in the performance of this great duty, confided especially to his care. He may go outside of the marine league to enforce the observance of this law. Is it not so? Suppose a case. Suppose adverse winds should blow the marine force from the shore, or that its own safety, because of storm or shoals or otherwise, should keep it more than three miles from shore, can it do nothing? Is it so, that if the expedition can only get a foot beyond three miles from shore, it may sail on in defiance of the Government, and carry on the expedition? Having crossed the line of the marine league, though it started from our shores in violation of our laws, it may now go on with impunity. A moment ago, and a mile nearer the shore, it was an unlawful expedition; but now it is a lawful one, and may not be touched. I would like to dwell at greater length upon this proposition, but I will hasten to another.

I claim this, then, the Government had the right to cross the line of the marine league; that it violated no law of nations, no law of our own enactment; and in doing this for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of this expedition, the President was in the strict line of his official duty.

Now, if you please, we stand at the line of the marine league of the country of Nicaragua. I admit that neither the act of 1818, nor the law of nations authorizes our naval forces to cross that line. Each nation shall be inviolate within its own exclusive territorial jurisdiction; and each nation has exclusive territorial jurisdiction to the distance of the marine league, or three English miles from her shores. We come, then, to this line of Nicaragua. The gate is shut. We cannot enter. But it may open to a friendly knock. If we knock, saying we come to prevent an invasion of the country by an expedition from ours, which intends to come in for an unlawful purpose; which intends to come in for a hostile purpose; if we knock in a friendly manner, and the gate is opened, all is right, and our entrance entirely lawful. I can maintain this proposition by authorities without number. There is no doubt about it.

If before we enter we have the consent of the neutral nation, or if without previous assent, our entrance be afterwards approved, no injury is done and no right violated. Volenti non fit injuria is a principle applicable here as everywhere. The ratification of an act after it is done makes it just as lawful as when done under authority previously delegated; and it lies only in the mouth of the neutral nation whose line of territory has been crossed, to make any objection to the entrance in such a case as we have now under consideration.

We have, Mr. Chairman, an abundance of authority for this; and that is not all. We have a case. I like to furnish cases as well as authority. About three years ago, not upon a gulf which washes our shores, but thousands of miles away, without any special instructions, a sloop-of-war of our country, in the eastern Mediterranean, demanded the surrender, by the Austrian authority, of a man who had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States? It was refused. It was a bold demand. It was an extraordinary exercise of power. The nation that had seized Kosztza was one of the first Powers of Europe. Captain Ingraham had no special instructions from his Government to prevent that wrong; but alone, on his own motion, upon the refusal to surrender the man, he prepared the deck of his sloop for battle. It did not take place, but he succeeded, and Kosztza was rescued from Austrian vengeance.

WHERE did he make the demand? In the port of a neutral nation—the Turkish Empire. That case came up for consideration; and the Austrian Minister at this point made his complaint of the act of Captain Ingraham; and one of the chief grounds of that complaint was that Captain Ingraham had violated the laws of nations by entering into a neutral port to enforce the alleged rights of the person whom he demanded. The reply was that it was no matter of complaint by the Austrian Empire; that it was a matter between the United States and the Turkish Empire, whether it was right or wrong; and if Turkey objected and demanded satisfaction, the United States would make satisfaction to her—to the party which was wronged, and not to Austria which had not been wronged. Such is the law; and such is the illusion; and I might stand here for an hour reading authorities to the point that it is not unlawful to cross the line of a neutral nation by its assent, given previous to or after the act.

As far as the Administration is concerned, therefore, the President had the right to do everything that has been done. He had the right to cross the line of the marine league from our shore; he had the right to pursue this expedition, which was being carried on, across the Gulf; and he had the right, with the consent of Nicaragua, to enter within her jurisdiction. I will speak of the act of Commodore Paulding and his instructions, in another connection, if time is allowed me. We have no statute, and there is no principle of international law; there is nothing which makes the breaking up of this expedition, by entering the jurisdiction of Nicaragua with her consent, an act not perfectly within the power and authority of the President. There is nothing which makes it wrong or unlawful for the President to do what has been done in this instance.

Again, Mr. Chairman, if it be admitted that General Walker was a citizen of the United States, I apprehend that the gentleman from Georgia, the gentleman from South Carolina, and all who have spoken on this question, will concur with me that it was within the power of the United States to take him, and break up the expedition by going out into the midst of the ocean. An American vessel, manned by American sailors, in mid-ocean, is just as much, and all the persons on board are just as much, within the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, for an infringement of its law, as when lying in one of our ports. The vessel is within the exclusive jurisdiction of this Government; and the men, as citizens of this Government, are responsible to it for a violation of its laws.

Well now, sir, was Walker a citizen of Nicaragua? It is very clear that in reference to his one hundred and fifty men, they were not. You can make no argument in their behalf. We had a right to arrest them and bring them home, beyond the shadow of a doubt, it seems to me. Was William Walker a Nicaraguan or a citizen of the United States? He was born here. When did he throw off his citizenship of this country, and become a citizen of Nicaragua? I admit the right of a man, if he has discharged his duties as a citizen, to cut the ties that bind him to his country. I do not deny, it were foolish and not American to deny that a man cannot throw off his allegiance to any country, where there has been no violation of the law—where he has lived up to the requirements of the society in which he was a member. But I affirm it by the authority of the decisions of the country, that no citizen has the right or has the power to get rid of his criminal responsibility to his country while doing an unlawful act. If a man were to plunder our Treasury, for instance, and then go to England or France, thus leaving the country to avoid the penalty of an unlawful act, he could not get rid of his obligations, as a citizen, for that act in any such way. I cannot expatriate myself by going away on an unlawful expedition—by fitting out a military expedition in violation of the neutrality laws. That very conduct will prevent me from getting rid of my citizenship; my country may bring me back as a fugitive from justice.

Mr. QUITMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman this question. According to the doctrines advanced by the gentleman, no man who happens to live in a country where he has committed an offense against its laws, or is supposed to have committed an offense against its laws, has any right to expatriate himself, or renounce his allegiance to that country and transfer it to another country. Having set out with that doctrine, as I understood the gentleman, I wish to ask him a practical question: What is the position of Mitchell, and Meagher, and their comrades, who are refugees from Australia, and who claim to have become citizens of the United States; are they still British subjects, or are they citizens of the United States?

Mr. GROESBECK. I will answer the inquiry of the gentleman as well as I am able to. I was taking the position that if a citizen of the United States, in the very act of expatriating himself, committed a crime, he could not claim that his commission of the crime worked his expatriation. That is the proposition I asserted. I asserted it by the authority of decisions of the Supreme Court, to which I will call the attention of the gentleman, one of which, at least, was made in connection with, and in construction of, this identical neutrality law. In 3 Dallas, pages 132, 153, the doctrine is so laid down. In 7 Wheaton, page 348, the same doctrine is laid down. It may be that the citizenship so acquired abroad would be recognized by the country in which it was acquired; but is that an expatriation which will exonerate him from liability to the country from whose justice he fled? The question is difficult. Suppose, for instance, that a man should commit a murder in this District, and should then flee the country to England, with which nation we had an extradition treaty. Suppose he should become there, in England, a constable, or captain, or colonel, or commander-in-chief of some petty fort. Does that exonerate him from the responsibility of the law of homicide committed in our own jurisdiction, and while he was amenable to it?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Allow me to inquire whether the gentleman is to be understood as intimating his belief that General Walker, at the time of his expatriation, was in the commission of a crime against the United States?

Mr. GROESBECK. I understand that General Walker claims to be a citizen of Nicaragua by virtue of his first expedition to that country.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman whether he pretends to say that General Walker was not duly naturalized, according to the naturalization laws of Nicaragua?

Mr. GROESBECK. That is a question I intended to ask myself—if he were?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to state my understanding?

Mr. GROESBECK. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. General William Walker was invited to that country. He and other colonists, under a grant, went to that country by invitation. He was naturalized according to the law of Nicaragua, just as foreigners are naturalized here—not in the same terms, but I mean that the process was the same. The end arrived at was the same. After that he was duly elected President of that Republic. His Government was recognized by this Government, and no Government, in opposition to his Government, was recognized by this Government until now.

Mr. GROESBECK. Allow me to speak to the statement which the gentleman has just made. I understand the fact to be that the first expedition fitted out by General Walker to Nicaragua was in violation of the neutrality laws of the United States, as I understand them.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. GROESBECK. I would be pleased to, but I do not wish my time consumed.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I would ask, with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, whether Walker was invited to Nicaragua by the Government, or only by citizens of that Republic?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. By the Government itself.

Mr. GROESBECK. Let me proceed. I know that Padre Vijil was recognized as the accredited Minister of Nicaragua during the last Administration. Who was President? Not General Walker. Is that, then, any recognition of the citizenship of General Walker? Take the case I put. Suppose a man should violate the criminal law of the District of Columbia, and then flee to London. Suppose, in course of time, he should become an officer of its police, or a civil officer. Does the fact of our recognition of England as one of the nations of the earth amount to an individual recognition of his citizenship there?

But, Mr. Chairman, as my time is drawing to a close, I wish to add, lest it may be supposed that I attach some importance to this particular proposition, that it makes not a particle of difference in the responsibility of the expedition to the law, and the obligations of the President to enforce the law—not a particle of difference whether the persons engaged in the expedition be Nicaraguans or of another country. There is no human being, I care not whence he comes, other than an accredited ambassador of a foreign nation, who is protected from the punishment of this law. He who comes within the jurisdiction of the United States must keep the laws of the United States, be he Nicaraguan or a native citizen. I merely alluded to this question, to show that in any aspect of it, even if Mr. Walker were not a citizen of the United States, his one hundred and fifty men were; and if he claimed anything as a Nicaraguan, he would be left in a miserable state of isolation in this particular phase of the argument.

I will now proceed to an examination of the conduct of Commodore Paulding.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. COLFAX, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PHELPS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives be allowed on Friday evening next to the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf, Dumb, and Blind, incorporated by Congress at its last session, for an exhibition of the progress made by the pupils of that institution.

Mr. MASON and others objected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, moved to suspend the rules to allow him to introduce the resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman from Maine to restrict the terms of his resolution to the use of the old Hall, as I propose to do in reference to the Colonization Society.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I have no objections to that, and make the modification accordingly.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The next thing will be an abolition meeting in the Hall. I object to the resolution, and move that the House adjourn.

The question was put; and decided in the affirmative—ayes 85, noes 80.

The House accordingly (at five minutes to four o'clock) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 12, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. W. H. CHAPMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BIGLER presented the petition of Hannah Stroop, widow of John Stroop, a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EVANS presented the memorial of Virginia Rose, for herself and others, heirs of Captain Alexander Rose, an officer in the revolutionary army, praying to be allowed half pay; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, presented the petition of A. S. H. White, praying for compensation for his services in signing land patents, under an appointment for that purpose dated December 12, 1856; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of J. B. Hancock and others, soldiers of the war of 1812, praying that pensions may be granted to all the officers and soldiers of that war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MALLORY presented papers in favor of the allowance of extra pay to William F. Lovell and others, officers and seamen of the expedition in search of Dr. Kane; which, with his petition on file, were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

TELEGRAPH TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have received, and been requested to present to the Senate, a memorial of Henry O'Reilly, concerning military highways, or stockade routes, for protecting travelers and settlers, and facilitating mail and telegraphic communication through the vast interior Territories, and rendering the United States independent of foreign countries for transmitting the mail between the Atlantic and Pacific States. I have also received from Mr. O'Reilly a memorial concerning the completion of a telegraph line to Fort Laramie and Salt Lake. It is addressed to the Senate by the corporators of the St. Louis and Salt Lake Telegraph Company. The two memorials substantially relate to the same subject, which is, the importance of a line of telegraph from the western border of Missouri or Iowa to Fort Laramie or the South Pass of the Rocky Mountains, and to Salt Lake, as soon as the troubles shall be so quieted there as to insure its protection, with a view to reach the Pacific ocean.

The memorialists are under the impression that the present state of difficulties in Utah Territory requires immediately the establishment of this telegraph line. They think it would facilitate the public service, and would save, during the Mormon war, ten times its cost to the United States in the transmission of intelligence from here to the seat of war, and from the seat of war to the capital. They ask that Congress shall take steps to protect the line. Their general plan is to establish a line of stockades, one every ten or twenty miles, and place a small number of soldiers at each stockade, so that the mails can be carried without interruption from the Indians, from one to the other, and so that a line of telegraph can be immediately laid down and kept in constant operation, by means of which telegraphic intelligence can be communicated to and from the Army.

It is due to Mr. O'Reilly to state that this is an old and a favorite project of his. It is now at least ten years since he began to petition Congress in favor of protecting this line so that he could establish his telegraph. I remember that a national convention was held at St. Louis, in 1849, in which this telegraph was recommended in connection with a railroad to the Pacific. The general plan then was substantially the same as that now proposed by Mr. O'Reilly, to wit: to establish these small, cheap stockades, one in every ten or twenty miles; the work to be done by the soldiers of the Army, and then to be protected by them, so as to keep the communication constantly open.

In furtherance of that line of policy, as early as 1846, a new regiment of troops was raised, called, in common parlance, the Oregon regiment, the object of which was to establish a line of stockades from the Missouri river to Oregon Territory, we then not having acquired California. The regiment was created for the purpose of establishing that service. I remember that we passed it just about the time when the war with Mexico broke out on the Rio Grande; and the exigencies of the public service justified the then Administration of the Government in sending that regiment to Mexico, where it was greatly needed, and postponing the construction of the stockades. President Polk having diverted that regiment for that purpose, as I suppose he had a right to do under the law, subsequent Administrations have not felt bound to detach it from the regular Army, and apply it to the service of establishing these stockades.

I trust that the time has now come when that favorite policy, established in 1846, and which has been called for by the public interests ever since, may be carried out. At least, I trust it may be so far carried out that we shall grant the prayer of the petition of Mr. O'Reilly, by establishing a telegraphic communication and protecting it as far as the present state of the country will authorize; penetrating into the Mormon territory, with a view of carrying it forward as soon as peace shall be established. I believe it would be an economical measure; I think it would be a great military movement which would save a large amount of money in the military operations of the Government; and with that view I commend it to the Senate. I suppose the proper committee to which to refer it is the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia; because, if there is any special emergency for it now, not heretofore existing, independent of the general good it would confer in a time of profound peace, it arises from the necessity of a telegraph to facilitate military communication. I therefore move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask for an order to print these memorials for the use of the Senate, in order that the committee may read them with more facility.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to print will be referred to the Committee on Printing, under the rules.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHAPLAINS.

Mr. BIGGS. I present the memorial of H. P. Barnes and forty-four others, citizens of Mississippi, praying for the abolition of chaplaincies in Congress and in the Army and Navy. The memorialists will probably be gratified to know that Congress has taken a step in the right direction by abolishing substantially the place or office of Chaplain in Congress. They ask also for the abolition of chaplaincies in the Army and Navy. This involves a grave constitutional question; and I presume the proper committee to which it ought to be referred is the Committee on the Judiciary. I therefore move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, in the hope that that committee will come to the conclusion to report a bill repealing all laws, practices, or regulations authorizing chaplaincies in the United States service.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FITZPATRICK, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Jane Smith, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Jane Baker, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print the memorials of Henry O'Reilly, reported in favor of printing the usual number; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution to authorize the printing and binding of two thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for the use of his office, reported it, with an amendment reducing the number to one thousand. The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution to print additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, reported adversely thereon; and the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution to print five hundred copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for the use of his office, reported it without amendment; and the resolution was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the message of the President of the United States, communicating correspondence of John W. Geary, late Governor of Kansas, reported in favor of the printing; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of War in relation to certain harbors on Lake Erie, communicated to the Senate on the 11th of January, reported that the same be printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of War in relation to the improvement of rivers and harbors in the State of New York, communicated January 11, reported in favor of the printing; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating an abstract of offers for furnishing articles falling under the cognizance of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, submitted an adverse report; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FOOT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 55) granting relief to certain officers and soldiers of the war of 1812, and of certain Indian wars; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 56) explanatory of an act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1855; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CHANGING THE NAMES OF VESSELS.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have been instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 32) to repeal an act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of vessels in certain cases," approved March 5, 1856, to report the bill back to the Senate with a recommendation that it pass; and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put the bill on its passage now. The necessity for it is urgent, as I will explain in a few words.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, not quite two years ago, an act was passed by Congress, intended to avoid the frequent applications which had been made in special cases for a change of the names of vessels. As these applications had never, in the memory of any of us, been refused, it was deemed proper to pass a general law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of vessels on application, and proper cause being shown. The law has been mischievous in the extreme in its operation. I have before me a list, or alphabetical register, containing a statement of ninety-two vessels whose names have been changed since the passage of that law; thirty-one of which have either been lost or foundered at sea, or have been the cause of injury to life or property.

It appears that so soon as this law was passed, the owner of every vessel which had lost its reputation by reason of accident, shipwreck, age, or any other cause whatever, changed the name of that vessel, for the purpose of deceiving the public into confiding property or life for transportation on board of it. In many of these cases the loss of life has been frightful. I will merely call to the attention of the Senate the case of the Central America. That vessel was the old George Law. If she had been put up for the voyage on which she was lost as the George Law, passengers would not have intrusted their safety to that vessel. Her name, under this law, was changed to the Central America, and the consequence was the deplorable shipwreck which we all remember as resulting in so tremendous a loss of human life. I have before me the report of the committee of captains and inspectors appointed by the New York board of underwriters to examine into the causes of the loss of that vessel; and a single passage of it will suffice to inform the Senate of the causes which led to that shipwreck:

"It cannot, and should not, be concealed, that the testimony before the committee goes to show that the Central America was not found and equipped as she ought to have been; that her crew was not sufficiently numerous; that she was without a carpenter, or suitable carpenter's tools; and what seems to the committee a most serious defect—being common, it is feared, in many of our passenger steamers—there was a want of proper organization in regard to the relative authority and duties of the officers and crew of the vessel."

In another case reported in the volume to which I have alluded, I find that one vessel had her name changed three times in eighteen months, having been repeatedly examined, condemned as rotten, then had her name changed, and finally she proceeded to sea, after two changes of name, and foundered at sea, as is supposed, she having never been since heard of. This vessel was originally called the Balaklava. She was seized for a violation of law, and condemned. Her name was then changed to the Magnolia, in April, 1856; she was examined, found rotten, and condemned at Key West. Her name was then changed to the Tropic Bird, in August, 1856; she put into Holmes's Hole, leaking badly; was sold at Gloucester; sailed for Surinam, and has never since been heard of.

Out of this list of ninety-two vessels, in the course of eighteen months over thirty have been found to be rotten, and their names changed simply as a deception on the public. The committee communicated with the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, and he advises the repeal of the law as expedient. Under these circumstances, and in view of these facts, I trust the Senate will allow the bill to be put on its passage at the present time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

Mr. MALLORY. There is a resolution on the table, which I presume will not give rise to discussion, which it is deemed highly important should be passed at this time. It is the joint resolution No. 4. I ask the consent of the Senate to take it up and pass it now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the second section of the act, approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

It provides that the operation of the second section of the act of January 16, 1857, limiting the restoration of officers in certain cases, shall be extended to April 16, 1858.

Mr. MALLORY. I offer, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, this amendment as a proviso:

Provided, That the time within which examinations by courts of inquiry may be made, as provided by the first section of the said act, shall not be extended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should be glad to know from the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs what the first section of the act of 1857 was.

Mr. MALLORY. The honorable Senator from Texas will see, by an examination of the act, that its provisions will expire on the 16th of January. He will also take cognizance of the fact that nominations are pending to be confirmed—I suppose I may go so far as to say that. The committee desire to prevent the commission of injustice to any parties, and therefore propose to extend the provisions of the act in this respect from the 16th of January to the 16th of April, which will give three months further. I presume that time will not all be occupied. We do not propose, however, to extend the time for any further examinations by these courts of inquiry.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rose to object to the amendment, because I think the courts should be permitted to remain open, so as to allow officers to go forward who may have been prevented from doing so by various causes. I think all the provisions of the act of last year should be extended so as not to prejudice any officer who may have been hitherto prevented from presenting his case. Many may have refrained from coming forward because of the want of means. Some relying on their salaries for the means of subsistence, may not have been able to bear the expense of the proceeding. Others may have been kept back by bad health. I trust that the rights of such officers will not receive any detriment from our action, and on that ground I should have raised my voice against the amendment, if I could be heard. If we are to extend any portion of the act, let us extend it all, in order to allow the President to convene a court of inquiry in any case where the parties may have refrained, on account of necessity, and not disinclination, from being applicants for the benefits of the law. I think it is right that all the benefits of the law should be extended, and that none of the officers should be cut off by a proviso of this kind.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I think the resolution is susceptible of an amendment which I hope the Senator from Florida will accept. By continuing only one section of the act of 1857, the other sections connected with it may be supposed to be repealed, or to have expired, and this may produce some difficulty. I propose, therefore, to strike out the words "the second section of," so as to leave the resolution simply to provide that the act of 1857 shall be extended for the length of time proposed. The proviso which has been inserted, guards against the only consequence that could possibly result, which the gentleman desires to avoid. I move the amendment which I have stated.

Mr. MALLORY. I have not time now to examine the law, but the amendment which the Senator from Kentucky contemplates, may possibly revive provisions in the law which the Senate would not wish to revive.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I think if the gentleman will take a moment to think of it, he will see that his object will be accomplished by the resolution, as it will stand, if amended as I propose. The act being continued as to only one section, may be embarrassing; but my amendment cannot embarrass the object the Senator from Florida has in view in preventing any further courts of inquiry. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MALLORY. I am apprehensive that the amendment, if adopted, may revive provisions in the act which the Senator himself does not contemplate reviving. I have not had time to examine that point. If he is satisfied of that, I will accept the amendment with pleasure. I limited the extension to the second section alone, because it was only contemplated for a specified object.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am willing that the proviso shall stand, and with that standing, I do not see what objection there can be to the amendment; while the resolution, in its original shape, may be of an embarrassing character.

Mr. MALLORY. I know that the Senator from Kentucky has the same object that I have; and if he is satisfied, I will accept his amendment.

• The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read a third time, and passed.

The title was amended, so as to read, "A joint resolution to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

Mr. MASON. I rise to move a reconsideration of the vote of the Senate, taken yesterday, by which the amendment of my colleague was adopted as an amendment to the joint resolution (S. No. 3) proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis.] I have been induced to do this, preserving my opinion still on the propriety of that amendment, but I had not sufficient time to give it that consideration which I should desire; and I do it with great pleasure, at the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Mississippi. I move to reconsider that vote.

Mr. HALE. We must first reconsider the vote passing the joint resolution.

Mr. MASON. Yes, sir. I move, first, to reconsider the vote by which it was passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by my colleague was adopted.

Mr. HUNTER. I am not aware that the Senate have agreed to reconsider the bill. Knowing the object for which it is to be reconsidered, I think we may as well take the sense of the Senate on that question as on anything else.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has agreed to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. MASON. I move to reconsider the vote on the amendment. I do not ask a vote on the motion to-day unless Senators desire it. At one o'clock I think there is a special order in executive session.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that vote will not be reconsidered. I have heard no argument urged against it that was not urged yesterday. I know of no new consideration that has been offered. I should like to hear some reason given to the Senate for changing the decision to which they came yesterday.

Mr. MASON. The Senator is doubtless aware that at one o'clock there is a special order in executive session. I have no desire to trespass on that order. If the vote is reconsidered, then the reasons for the reconsideration I think will more properly be before the Senate. When the question is again on adopting the amendment, I shall be prepared to give my reasons; but I will not now detain the Senate with them.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand the motion to reconsider the vote on the amendment, to be a test vote, and this is the time to give the reasons.

Mr. DAVIS. I submit to the Senator from Virginia, whether a proposition to reconsider is not rather an opportunity to give the reasons why the vote should be changed. We ask an opportunity to give the reasons why the decision of the Senate on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia should be reversed. I do not understand that this is a test question. I think there are reasons to be given, and I hope the opportunity will be afforded to the Senate to hear them. If it be desirable to go into the discussion now, I am ready, though I think it proper, if the Senate choose to give us the opportunity, that it should first be done by deciding that they will reconsider the question.

Mr. STUART. It is very obvious that this question cannot be disposed of to-day. The motion to reconsider being entered, of course stands, and will come up at a future day. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order in executive session, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to make a suggestion in connection with this motion. On reflection, he supposes it will be proper first to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, so as to get back to the point of reconsidering the amendment.

Mr. MASON. I make that motion—to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

Mr. STUART. I move to postpone the further consideration of that motion until to-morrow.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 12, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. G. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

POST OFFICE AT HARRISBURG.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I was not present the other day when the States were called for resolutions, and may not be present when they are called again. I have a resolution of a local character, and desire to introduce it for reference only.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Let it be read for information.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of constructing a post office at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the call of committees for reports.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have the message of the President in reply to the resolution which we adopted last week, laid before the House. My object is to move the reference and printing of the message and accompanying papers, and to move the previous question without any debate. I think they ought to get before the country, and I hope there will be no objection.

No objection being made,

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting to the House of Representatives a report of the Secretary of State, of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the Secretary of the Navy, and of the Attorney General, with the accompanying documents, containing the information called for by the resolution of the House of the 4th instant, concerning the late seizure of General William Walker and his followers in Nicaragua, &c.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move the following resolution in reference to those papers:

Resolved, That the President's message and accompanying documents be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, except so much thereof as relates to the conduct of Commodore Paulding, and other officers of the Navy, having reference to the Navy Department, and concerning the construction and obedience of the order of the said Department by the said officers, which is referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

My object is to meet the views of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and I understand that the resolution in this shape is satisfactory to him. It refers the message generally to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in which the matter originated; but that part of the message which is specified in the resolution is referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I move the previous question.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will withdraw that portion of the resolution which refers any portion of that communication to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It strikes me that it is all germane to one subject, and that the report thereon should come from one committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, for the purpose of saying, that as far as the conduct of Commodore Paulding is concerned in obeying the regulations of the Navy Department, and having obeyed them, I think the Naval Committee should take charge of it; and as the members of that committee desire it, I hope it will take that reference.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I beg leave to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I owe it to the House, a resolution having been adopted to terminate debate on the President's annual message on Thursday next, at one o'clock, to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I yielded to my friend with the distinct understanding that he was to demand the previous question. If we open this matter to debate now, and get into debate upon Commodore Paulding and Nicaragua, it will consume the whole day.

Mr. BOCK. I desire the consent of the gentleman from North Carolina to say a word in explanation.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I yield to the gentleman, if I can do so without losing my right to move the previous question.

Mr. BOCK. I wish to say, in reply to a remark made by the gentleman, that the Committee on Naval Affairs took this subject into consideration, and were under the impression that the conduct of Commodore Paulding, and that of other officers of the Navy, is such, and their relations to the Navy Department are such, that the question, whether they obeyed orders, should be examined by a committee cognizant of naval affairs, and prepared to examine it in that point of view. They therefore instructed me—it was not a matter of my own motion—as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to make a motion to the House to refer so much of this message and the accompanying documents as refers to Nicaragua and other foreign countries, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and that so much thereof as relates to Commodore Paulding and other officers of the Navy, and their relations to the Navy Department, and the question of their obedience to instructions, to the Committee on Naval Affairs. But, as the gentleman from North Carolina has kindly consented to make the motion himself, I have discharged the duty imposed upon me by the Committee on Naval Affairs in making this statement, and, therefore, I yield to the motion made by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I made the motion with the distinct purpose of giving gentlemen a full opportunity to express their views upon a report made upon the subject. At the present time, I think discussion premature, and therefore demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLINGMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTION OF MINNESOTA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I have received from Samuel Medary, Governor of the Territory of Minnesota, a copy of the constitution of Minnesota, together with an abstract of the votes polled for and against said constitution, at the election held in that Territory on the second Tuesday in October last, certified by the Governor in due form, which I now lay before Congress in the manner prescribed by that instrument. Having received but a single copy of the constitution, I transmit it to the Senate.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask to have that communication read again. I wish to learn whether there is any reference made in it in regard to the census of the Territory—and for this reason: It will be recollected by the House that by the enabling act it was provided that Minnesota should have one Representative, and others in proportion to her population, as it should be shown by the census. The constitution provides that there shall be elected three members of Congress; and I understand that three members of Congress have been elected. Now, sir, I desire to know—and that is the reason why I ask for the reading of the communication, not having paid particular attention to it when it was being read—if there is anything said in the letter in regard to the census, so that this House may know how many members that State will be entitled to on its admission.

The communication of the President was again read.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ARREST OF WILLIAM WALKER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit a report from the Secretary of State in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th instant, requiring to be informed if any complaint had been made against our Government by the Government of Nicaragua, on account of the recent arrest of William Walker and his followers by Captain Paulding within the territory of that Republic.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, January 7, 1858.

The report from the Secretary of State was read, as follows:

To the President of the United States:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 4th instant, requiring the President to inform that House, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether the Government of Nicaragua has made any complaint against our Government on account of the act of Captain Paulding, in arresting William Walker and his followers within the territory of Nicaragua, has the honor to report that no such complaint has reached this Department.

Respectfully submitted, LEWIS CASS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, January 7, 1858.

On motion of Mr. CLINGMAN, the communication and accompanying report were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MISCELLANEOUS CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the expenditures of the moneys appropriated for the discharge of miscellaneous claims, not otherwise provided for, and paid at the Treasury, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYEES OF THE CLERK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, containing the annual statement of the clerks and other persons employed in the office of the Clerk; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

JEANNETTE M'CALL.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the papers in the case of Jeannette McCall, for the purpose of having them sent to the Senate. A bill for her relief was introduced into the House at the last session of Congress, sent to a committee, and reported back. I desire now to have the bill and papers sent to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. What is to be done with the papers?

The SPEAKER. They are to be referred to the Senate.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Colonization Society be allowed the use of the old Hall of the House of Representatives on the 19th instant.

Mr. BARKSDALE, and others, objected.

CLERK'S ACCOUNTS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to what I consider a privileged question. I am directed by the committee which was appointed to investigate the conduct of the late Clerk of the House, to ask the House to make the following order—

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that a question of privilege.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report a resolution.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

POST OFFICE AT BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I have the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] to submit a resolution.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am desirous to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but I have no objection to accommodate gentlemen around me, if the propositions do not lead to any debate.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I desire to introduce a simple resolution for reference.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a post office in the city of Brooklyn, New York, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

NANCY DE HOLKAR.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Nancy De Holkar, for reference to the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill to authorize the issue of a register to the bark Jehu. Also, that the Senate had passed a bill to authorize a register to be issued to the steamer Fearless; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

CLERK'S ACCOUNTS.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask leave to introduce a resolution giving further directions to the committee appointed to inquire into the accounts of the late Clerk of the House. I desire to have it read.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now renew my motion to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] moving the reference of a certain portion of the message to a special committee; and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLOGG] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Chairman, whether this measure now before the committee is really intended to sustain the honor and character of our country or not, or whether it is intended merely as a pretext to heroize Mr. Walker, or subsequently to subjugate Nicaragua, is hard to determine from the debates which have taken place upon this floor. But one thing is certain: that from the indications here, and from the arguments that have been adduced in this House, it is due to the President of the United States that his proposition relating to this question should be placed in the hands of his friends. Mr. Chairman, if ever a President of the United States needed the supporting hands of his friends, it is now. Who, sir, can tell which is the Administration party on this floor? Who can tell, in this day of Democracy, which and what are the Administration measures? Look you to the Senate. The Warwick of the Administration in that body has refused it his support; and standing aloof, proudly conscious of his strength, like the Warwick of England, he hurls defiance at the Administration. In this House, sir, who are the friends of the Administration? In this House the Iron Duke—the Wellington of the party—has refused his support to the measures of the Administration, now tottering before the end of the first quarter of its existence. It came into power with a national Treasury bursting with plethora. Now, before the end of the first year, the Treasury is empty and the Government bankrupt. The Central American question is pressing hard upon the President. Filibusterism is about to overwhelm him. Then, again, the Kansas outrage, which he seems to be pressing forward with the view of the destruction of freemen's rights, is hurled back upon him from nearly every portion of the country until he is ready to sink under it. Yea, sir, Utah has defied the power of the General Government; and Brigham Young, from his harem, laughs the Government to scorn. This, sir, is the position of the Administration. Sir, methinks I hear the President now exclaiming: "save me from my friends!" May we then not exclaim: "What an immortality of fame awaits the sage of Wheatland!"

In discussing the question before the committee, I propose to base what few remarks I have to make upon record evidence, upon the evidence of the annual message of the President, and upon the evidence of the message received this morning; I propose to base it upon a correspondence between Walker and the officers of the Navy, which is now a part of the history of the country; I propose to base it, sir, upon the arguments which have been adduced in this committee; and then I propose to show that there is abundance of evidence to prove that the Administration was right in the commencement, and right in every position taken by it in relation to Nicaragua up to the time of the return of Walker to this country by the act of Commodore Paulding. I propose to show that its acts were strictly in accordance with the duties which we owe to foreign countries, as well as to the duties we owe to ourselves to sustain our national honor and reputation.

I propose, also, to discuss the right of Paulding to land upon the soil of Nicaragua as a mere matter of right, and also with the further consent of that Government—for that had been given; and, because of that right, to show that it became our duty to cause the arrest of the invading force, and that every step taken by Commodore Paulding, who has been arraigned before this committee, was in strict accordance with the law of nations, and with the instructions of the President. If the President has been derelict in duty at all, it was in not adopting measures sufficiently stringent to have prevented Walker from leaving our shores, and in not arresting and holding him for trial when he was returned within our jurisdiction.

I propose now, for a moment, to call the attention of the committee to the annual message of the President of the United States; and in speaking of the conduct of Walker I shall use no stronger language than has been employed in that message. I propose to use no epithets in reference to William Walker, or connected with him, except those which I find in the message of the President.

The great question before this House, and before the country, is not a question between Walker and Commodore Paulding. It is not a question between Walker and his friends and the Government of the United States; but it is a question whether this Government has discharged its duty and sustained its honor? That is the question above all others which the people will recognize; that is the question which they will discuss; and it is the question which they will decide when they fix the fate of men in high places. Mere technicalities and forms are trifles when compared with the great principles of national rights and national duties of this great Republic of ours. I read from the President's message:

"It is one of the first and highest duties of any independent State, in its relations with the members of the great family of nations, to restrain its people from acts of hostile aggression against their citizens or subjects. The most eminent writers on public law do not hesitate to denounce such hostile acts as robbery and murder.

"Weak and feeble States, like those of Central America, may not feel themselves able to assert and vindicate their rights. The case would be far different if expeditions were set on foot within our own territories to make private war against a powerful nation. If such expeditions were fitted out from abroad against any portion of our own country, to burn down our cities, murder and plunder our people, and usurp our Government, we should call any Power on earth to the strictest account for not preventing such enormities."

And now, sir, when an officer of the General Government, with instructions in his pocket to enforce the laws of the country, has seized the man whom the President denounces as a robber and a murderer; when an expedition is arrested going from this powerful Government to a weak Republic with a view to invasion of its territory and the destruction of its Government—before this great and generous people, in the Hall of the Representatives of the people of this nation, where is supposed to be found the sentiment of America, an officer who, under the banner of his country, did his country's bidding, has to be put on trial whether he or General Walker is the better man. It is made a question whether Walker is the hero, and Paulding the intermeddling official. It is a strange issue, which I will discuss more hereafter than at the present moment. The President in his message says the leader of the recent expedition was arrested at New Orleans, and was discharged on giving bail in the insufficient sum of $2,000.

Are these principles of the message found only in the enactments of our statute-book? are they to be found first in an act of a Legislature? No, sir, they are found in that portion of the international law which was recognized as soon as governments began. They are the great principles of eternal justice that exist as well between man and man as between nation and nation; they are to be found in the duty which we owe to one another and in the respect which we owe to ourselves. They are to be found in the rights of Nicaragua. The fact is, that when we are just to others we sustain our own character and dignity. Because we are powerful we owe it to Nicaragua to protect her from aggressive invasion from our own territory on the part of lawless adventurers. We ought, with a view to our own character, to discharge that duty fully. I repeat that it is the principle originally found in the law of necessity and the law of right between nation and nation, which the President has recognized in his message to the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the facts and principles which are presented in this case, with a view to the action which ought to be taken by this Government; this is a principle found, not in our statute-book, but in the law of nations. (This ground has already been taken by gentlemen who have spoken on this question.) I read from an authority that will not, I think, be questioned, which defines the right of Nicaragua, and the duty on our part to be observed. In speaking of sovereigns, Vattel says:

"If a sovereign, who might keep his subjects within the rules of justice and peace, suffers them to injure a foreign nation, either in its body or its members, he does no less an injury to that nation than if he injured them himself. In short, the safety of the State, and that of human society, requires this attention from every sovereign. If you let loose the reins of your subjects against foreign nations, these will behave in the same manner to you; and instead of that friendly intercourse which nature has established between all men, we should see nothing but one nation robbing another."

Strange as it may seem, there seems to be a portion of the members of this body who are making for Mr. Walker all the excuses and justifications that can be made, regardless of the duty and honor of Government, the rights of Nicaragua, or the justice due Commodore Paulding. If he be in truth the hero, if he be in truth the patriot that they make him by their charges against Commodore Paulding, who has faithfully executed the laws of the Government, then I ask that the charge be made against the President and the Administration. Let them be charged home upon the policy of this Government, and not upon the head of a meritorious and valuable officer of the Navy. Walker was expelled from Nicaragua. Whether he was ever elected its President or not is not important for me to inquire. If he was so elected his election was secured by the force of American arms, and by the votes of invaders from our own soil. By the aid of American depredators he may have kept up for a time a successful rebellion there. But the natives of the country in their strength drove him from their borders, and the broad flag of our country floated at the mast-head of the vessel which in sympathy brought away the wretched and ruined remnant of his followers.

It is said on my left that not one of them was hanged. No, sir, none; who would hang such unfortunate men—men depressed in spirit, diseased, and ruined, who had been seduced from their homes by the hope of plunder? Instead of hanging it would have been better to have sent them where the rights of man are respected, and the rights of Governments held sacred.

He was expelled from the country, and he came to our shores. And, now, mark what is the basis of all this matter before the country. Do you suppose that Commodore Paulding is the originator of that? Do you suppose that it originated outside of the Executive Mansion? No, sir; it originated there, and there is where the fierce artillery should be felt.

The Administration receives some support—however feeble it may be—on the Republican side of the House. But this I have to say, that I believe, in my heart and soul, that when the honor of the country is concerned, when the country is in danger, then you will find rallying round its standard the entire Republican force of the country. We are not fillibusters; we are not hero-makers. We desire our country to move steadily onward, peacefully, justly, but with certain progression, and if she shall reach with her influence Central America, I say—God speed. If it shall reach and embrace the islands of the sea, I say—it is well; but let us move forward peacefully, justly, and progressively; in accordance with the character, spirit, and genius of the age.

Walker was expelled from Nicaragua by its inhabitants; and again fitting out another expedition of invasion, our Government interposed its power to enforce its own laws and protect Nicaragua. And this act of ours is somewhat convulsing the country, and more particularly the Democratic party—though with that I find no particular objection, for if each branch of that party should do justice to the other, and purge it well, it would, I think, be of benefit to the country.

When Walker was about to return to Central America, (I ask gentlemen upon the other side to look at the records of the country,) the official who represented Central America at our Government, demanded that our Government should exercise her rights and discharge her duty to that Republic, and sustain her own reputation. I ask here to read a communication signed by him who is now the Minister from that Republic to this Government, who was then unrecognized, but who was acting in connection with another, in behalf of Central America. I read now a letter signed by A. J. De Yrisarri and Luis Molina, and also the instructions of General Cass, prompted by this complaint. They are as follows:

New York, September 14, 1857.
The undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republics of Guatemala and Salvador, and the Chargé d'Affaires of the Republic of Costa Rica, have the honor to make known to the Secretary of State of the United States, that there is no doubt that there is being prepared, in the southern part of this Republic, an expedition, under the orders of the adventurer William Walker, the which, according to the advices published in the public journals, will sail about the middle of the present month, or the beginning of the next, and will proceed to the Bocas del Toro, where it will receive the armament which has been prepared in this port of New York to be forwarded to said point. It is probable that the uniting of the expeditionists and the aforesaid armament, at the Bocas del Toro, may be for the purpose of these new invaders of Nicaragua entering the port of San Juan del Norte, for they have no other port at which they can enter. The undersigned hope that the Government of the United States, in view that it cannot prevent the debarkation of this expedition, so publicly and shamelessly announced, like all the others, will order that a vessel of war of the United States prevent the landing of these aggressors in the Bocas del Toro, and that positive orders be given to the vessel of war that may be lying in San Juan del Norte, also to prevent the landing of the said fillibusters on that coast, causing them to return to the United States, as transgressors of the laws of this country, and as disturbers of the peace and security of friendly nations.

With the highest consideration, the undersigned have the honor to subscribe themselves, of the Secretary of State of the United States, the attentive and obedient servants,

Hon. LEWIS CASS.

A. J. DE YRISARRI,
LUIS MOLINA.

WASHINGTON, September 18, 1857.

SIR: From information received at this Department, there is reason to believe that lawless persons are now engaged within the limits of the United States in setting on foot and preparing the means for military expeditions to be carried on against the territories of Mexico, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica—Republics with whom the United States are at peace—in direct violation of the sixth section of the act of Congress, approved 20th April, 1819. And, under the eighth section of the said act, it is made lawful for the President, or such person as he shall empower, to employ the land and naval forces of the United States, and the militia thereof, for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States. I am, therefore, directed by the President to call your attention to the subject, and to urge you to use all due diligence, and to avail yourself of all legitimate means at your command to enforce these and other provisions of the said act of 20th April, 1819, against those who may be found to be engaged in setting on foot or preparing military expeditions against the territories of Mexico, Costa Rica, and Nicaragua, so manifestly prejudicial to the national character, and so injurious to the national interest. And you are hereby instructed promptly to communicate to this Department the earliest information you may receive relative to such expeditions.

I am, sir, your obedient servant, LEWIS CASS.

My object in having the papers read was to show the basis of our present state of affairs; to show that Nicaragua herself proposed that that expedition should be arrested, and that Walker and his party should be brought back to the Government of the United States. There is the complaint of the offended country. That country, by her representative—not then recognized, but recognized since and before this aggression, as the minister of that nation—made application that this man Walker and his confederates should be arrested and brought back from the shores of Nicaragua. Now, what was the object of that? Was the object to sustain our law, and to enforce the penalty against Walker? No, sir; there was a broader and a higher necessity; there was a greater and more dangerous evil threatening; and it was to bring back from Nicaragua those men who were carrying on an invasion against that nation. It was to save and protect that State, and to take into custody those who were despoiling that Government. That was the reason, and the only reason. The Secretary of State, in accordance with that request of the representative of that State, issued his order to the Navy, to the Army, to the marshals, and to the civil authorities, to uphold the rights of Nicaragua, and save the laws of our Confederacy from violation.

Do gentlemen suppose that there is no other point in this case than the question whether General Walker should be imprisoned? Do gentlemen suppose the question is between Walker and Paulding? Do gentlemen suppose that the question which agitates this country is whether Walker is a hero, or whether Paulding is an honorable man? No, sir. What then was the object of that order? It was to do what the Government of Nicaragua asked should be done. The object of that order of Secretary Cass was to carry out the request, and to execute the law, for the purpose of the protection of Nicaragua. Now, I desire that gentlemen should meet this question upon this high ground, and to strike home to the very object of the order. If the House cannot see that the object of that application, and of that order, was the security of Nicaragua, then I am much mistaken in the judgment of this House. Now, if this was the order given to Paulding, if it was the heart and soul of the requisition, where was he to execute it? Gentlemen talk of writs and jurisdiction of a marine league—talk of the high seas—talk of the coast, but they must remember that our Navy is the great power by which our international laws are enforced. It is the ministerial power in the hands of the Executive. Where American commerce is outraged, no writ issues. Where American rights are invaded, no legal order issues—nothing but the general order of the Executive—to enforce our rights and redress our grievances.

I ask gentlemen to turn their attention to the case of Ingraham. What was the order to Ingraham? None on earth. But his mission was to protect American rights; and what did he do? Without the knowledge of the Executive, without an order from the Government, Ingraham went aboard an Austrian vessel of war, and took therefrom Koszta, who had only declared his intention to become an American citizen. What order had he for that act? Nothing but the order of the law; nothing but the order of the genius of our country—an order written on the flag which bears the stars and stripes. That act was sustained by our Government, and shed new luster upon the naval arm of the Government. Where American rights need protection and enforcement, the naval power of the country is present to enforce those rights.

Nicaragua had the right to hold our Government responsible for the protection of her territory from aggressions of American citizens; and if such is the duty of our Government, is it to be said that it has no power to fulfill that duty? If that were true, then it would be the duty of Congress to bestow such power on the Executive as would enable it to carry on the machinery of the Government; justice to other nations, and to our own character, demands it.

In regard to the question whether Commodore Paulding was justified in entering on the soil of Nicaragua and arresting those whom the President denominates murderers and robbers, I propose to consider it in two phases—first as against Walker, and second as against the sovereignty of Nicaragua, with which Republic we are at peace, and a minister of which, to our Government, we recognize in this capital.

Walker was amenable to the laws of the United States. So says the President. He was arrested and held to bail. I was astonished to hear gentlemen of learning in this House say that Walker having given bail should not have been again arrested. Do gentlemen not remember that that bail was taken before an examining court? And do they not remember that the decision of an examining court is never final? But, apart from technicality, do gentlemen not remember that the act for which Walker was arrested by Commodore Paulding, was perpetrated subsequently to the time when he was first arrested and admitted to bail? It will not be said—it cannot be said—that that bail gave him immunity for all time. It cannot be said that the court at New Orleans could grant an immunity and indulgence to him to commit murder and robbery on the soil of another country. And when he and his followers were arrested on the soil of Nicaragua what right has he to complain? What right can his friends show for him here, because of the place of arrest?

I lay it down as a rule of law and a rule of justice, an eternal right—whether on the statute-books or in the mere elements of law—that he who violates the law cannot make to himself a city of refuge. Nowhere on God's earth—on the ocean, on shipboard, on a foreign soil, or in a desolate land—can he make to himself a place or city of refuge. The law follows him, and, as against him, he may be seized wherever he may be found. This is the law recognized everywhere. When a murderer or a robber who commits a crime in one State and flees to another, and is there arrested without the permission of that State, and is returned for trial, and puts in his plea that he was not legally arrested, what then? Why, the judge responds, "You are in court; you have broken the law of the land, and you are liable to punishment." It would be a strange plea for a murderer who escapes from Illinois and is arrested in Indiana, and brought back, to say that he was illegally arrested. Do you suppose that that plea would be heeded? Nay, further! Suppose the State of Indiana demanded the return of such murderer, my opinion is, that the response of the State of Illinois, Virginia, Mississippi, or North Carolina would be, "We will hang him first, and then send him back. He murdered our citizen, and is amenable to our laws!"

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1838.

NEW SERIES....No. 17.

And, sir, if it should now come to this that Nicaragua should so far forget her flag, and her own honor and dignity, as to ask for the return of Walker, my proposition would be to fine and imprison him, and then let Nicaragua do with him just as it may please. That would be just, and would carry out, I think, the policy of the Administration.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words as to the right of Nicaragua herself to complain.

Speaking of the right of one Government to enter the territory of another, Vattel, a book of authority on the law of nations, says:

"It cannot, then, without doing an injury to the State, enter, sword in hand, into a territory in pursuit of a criminal, and take him from thence. This would be an invasion of territory, and an injury to the sovereignty of such State."

That, sir, is the authority on the other side of the House on this question. And how does it affect the question before us? Why, sir, in this manner: it follows that you have no right to enter the territory of another, sword in hand; because you invade a great principle of independent sovereignty by so doing. But mark you, if you enter that territory for the purpose of sustaining its integrity; if you enter it to preserve its life; if you enter it to preserve it from violation and conquest by an aggressor, a pirate, or robber; then, if you enter the territory of another without its consent, you have violated no principle of justice, sovereignty, or right, because you have done no wrong, but have saved the life of its Government.

That is the doctrine, sir, which I lay down; and now let me apply it to Nicaragua. The principle is the same as in the common affairs of life. Our police officers are bound to keep the peace; but suppose they hear threatenings of murder, or see demonstrations for the destruction of human life, it is then their duty to be on the alert; the dagger is raised to strike; the officer steps on the soil owned by the threatened victim. Has he no right to enter there? Sir, our officers have the right to enter upon the premises of another when they go there, because it is their duty to save the life of the individual.

Sir, we have entered Nicaragua in the discharge of a higher duty,—to protect it from invasion and subjugation, and that by an armed force from this Government. We have done it at the request of that Government, to save it from spoliation and ruin. Will the man over whose head the sword has been suspended, turn round, after his life has been saved, and say, "Why did you enter my grounds? Why did you come upon my premises?" The reply is, "To save your life." "True, you have saved my life. It was your duty; but I will prosecute you for coming on my ground." That is the doctrine in relation to Nicaragua and General Walker. But, sir, I wish to call the attention of the committee to another fact, and then ask them whether they wish this Government to return Walker to Nicaragua or not. The Government of Nicaragua have asked for his expulsion, and now do they ask for his return? No, sir. Our Government has acted precisely in accordance with the request of that Government, and they are estopped by their own act from asking for his return to Nicaragua. They have asked for his expulsion, and this Government has acted precisely in accordance with his request. The President says they have not complained. Who, then, shall complain?

But, again, can they complain? If it was our duty to enter their territory to protect them from aggression, then because of that duty we had a right to enter, and we must have the means of protection. But it is said that Commodore Paulding entered the territory of Nicaragua in violation of his duty. Sir, his duty was to anticipate and prevent the carrying on of such an expedition from our shores. I ask you if it was not in accordance with his instructions to stop and prevent that aggression and that wrong? Sir, it was; and that could not be done by any other means. The act which he performed was simply to prevent an aggression and a wrong against Nicaragua. The moment the expedition left our shores, he was carrying it on. The moment he reached Nicaragua he was carrying it on. The moment he planted his standard upon Nicaraguan soil, he was carrying on or executing an act which the President denominates robbery and murder.

Sir, Nicaragua cannot complain, and General Walker cannot complain. Nicaragua has not complained. We have not invaded her territory; we have simply taken a criminal which they asked us to take and return to our shores. He was a criminal by law, and we have taken him. There is no man who can say that the act was in violation of any principle of justice or right.

Now, sir, if I am right in my deduction, I wish to call the attention of the friends of the Administration to the position in which they stand. I want to know whether they are vamping or not. I want to know whether James Buchanan, the Chief of the nation, was in earnest, when he boldly declared his intention to arrest these murderers and robbers? I ask those gentlemen who sustain him on this floor to answer that question. Where is Walker, sir? Is he not within your jurisdiction? Where is he?

A MEMBER. In Richmond, Virginia.

Mr. KELLOGG. In Richmond, Virginia. Well, sir, I heard a few days ago that he was in this capital. Now, sir, if Walker was an aggressor, and if the President was right when he issued his instructions to Commodore Paulding, I ask you why they did not arrest him when he was within the jurisdiction and power of the General Government? He was taken by an officer of the Navy. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] said that he submitted to the flag of his country. I have great respect for the opinions of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee; but I confess that I have not been able to see a great stretch of magnanimous conduct in not running away when he had given his parol of honor, especially as he could not get away if he would.

But, sir, I was proceeding to say that when Walker had been taken by Commodore Paulding, and brought to New York, he came into the hands of the marshal of the southern district of New York. Was this Administration vamping or did it denounce Walker as a robber and murderer? and if not, why did they dismiss him in peace, when he was in their power? Why did the President and Secretary of State let him go when Marshal Rynders had brought him to them? The President has told you that this man had committed dangerous crimes. He was arrested by our authority, and under our jurisdiction. The President has told you this morning that the Government of Nicaragua makes no complaint, and still a great criminal, according to the language of the President, is at large and feasted. He is made a lion of, and if the Administration do not well look to it he will put his paw upon their head.

If the committee will bear with me I will read what perhaps may be a solution of this mystery, that this was but a mere pretense of honesty and determination to maintain the rights of others, which it was never intended to execute. I believe that there were two blunders: the President of the United States mistook the Commodore, and the Commodore mistook the President. The President issued his order to arrest, but supposed the Commodore would bluster, but fail to find Walker; but the Commodore, unlike a politician who could find some ready excuse for not doing it, and like one in the habit of obeying orders, thought the President meant just what he said, and arrested Walker and brought him back. I read from Mr. Walker's letter, which was published in the newspapers, and which has never been contradicted:

"I have the honor to report these facts to you, and to request that you will cause Commander Chataud to cease this unjust and illegal conduct. As a native of the United States, engaged in what your Government admits to be a lawful undertaking, and awaiting rights which cannot but commend themselves to the sense of justice of all civilized nations, I claim as my due that you shall not permit the sovereignty of Nicaragua to be violated by the commander of the Saratoga, for the purpose of gratifying his opinions or his prejudices. With full confidence, I ask from your hands that justice which it is the proud boast of your Government to award to all.

"I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
"WILLIAM WALKER,
"Commander-in-Chief Army of Nicaragua.
"Commodore H. PAULDING, United States Navy."

I do not know whether Walker intended to bring the Administration into difficulty. He said in his communications to officers of the Navy that the Government admitted the justice of his enterprise, and the lawfulness of his undertaking. If that be so, then the President meant nothing. If it be not true, why then do they not arrest General Walker while he is in the jurisdiction of the United States? The country demands his arrest, and if the Administration be true to itself and the country, the arrest will be made. I suppose the furor is all to be in debate and not in action, and that Walker is to pass free.

I want to say another word in reference to Paulding. I have suggested that Paulding was on trial here; and do gentlemen know the character of Paulding? Does he know that he is an able and efficient officer of the Navy, who has fought the battles of the country? He is an honorable man, and from the stock that captured André. He is the son of that John Paulding who captured Major André during the revolutionary struggle. Look now at his case and the one similar to it, which I have referred to. In the one case, Congress, by resolution, voted a medal and its thanks; and in the other, the case of Commodore Paulding, for arresting a man who it has been said was a disgrace to the flag of the country and a depredator upon the rights of man and nations, he is denounced in the Halls of Congress. When the people come to make up a record, when they come to take action on this subject, they will look at the question as one of good faith and justice. They will make the record of Commodore Paulding as clear and bright as that of his father.

I have thus, Mr. Chairman, briefly discussed the points in the case with a view to bring before this committee, the Administration, and the friends of General Walker, the relative positions which they occupy upon the record. I desire nothing more than that the nation's honor shall be maintained, and that we shall be true to ourselves. The United States should respect the rights of weaker nations, as ours, if she were the weaker nation, should like to be respected. This is demanded by the country and the civilized world, and it is demanded in justice to Commodore Paulding and in justice to the Administration itself.

Mr. MOORE obtained the floor.

Mr. HASKIN. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to yield to me a moment for a brief personal explanation.

Mr. MOORE. I will yield if it is not taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. HASKIN. I will be brief.

Mr. MOORE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HASKIN. Mr. Chairman, considering the perverted use which was made on Thursday last by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER,] and also by some of the newspapers of the country, of the figurative expression indulged in by me, in the course of some remarks in the defense of Commodore Paulding, my constituent, that I was in favor of "national grand larceny," I deem it proper that I should occupy the time of the House for a few minutes, in explanation and reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

This expression was made in an argument to illustrate an idea in reference to the Walker expedition. It was an alternative proposition. If this Government did (and I hoped and argued they would not) justify Walker and his expedition, which I characterized as "a petty larceny affair," then it would be far better for the Government to filibuster on a large and grand scale.

The President has ably and most justly elaborated rated in his recent message the idea which I intended to convey:

"It would be far better, and more in accordance with the bold and manly spirit of our countrymen, for the Government itself to get up such expeditions, than to allow them to proceed under the command of irresponsible adventurers. We could then, at least, exercise some control over our own agents, and prevent them from burning down cities, and committing other acts of enormity of which we have read."

My jocose and figurative expression was in its fair application understood by the House, when it was made, and it excited, as it was calculated to do, a laugh.

I did not at the time entertain the belief that any gentleman on this floor seriously thought that I proposed favoring grand larceny, in a literal sense. This supposition could not have been fairly entertained, because larceny is the stealing of personal property—it is a crime defined and punished by the local laws of the States; and it could not, legitimately, be made referable to the national conquest of the Island of Cuba, or Central America.

If any FELONIOUS HABITS can be fairly imputed to any political party in this country, surely they may be attributed to that one which has hitherto aided and abetted and gloried in the appropriation of their neighbors' goods, and out of which it has made much of its ephemeral capital. They call themselves the Republican party—of which the gentleman from Massachusetts, who stands forth as my accuser, is a representative and a shining light.

Sir, the records of this House, and especially the very able report of the chairman of the corruption committee of the last session—our present impartial and distinguished Speaker—prove that the party of the gentleman from Massachusetts is the "grand larceny" party of the country. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that the crime is a "mean one"—that it is "contemptible," and I reprobate and condemn it. I hope that the members of the Republican party in the present House will do as much to stop plundering as some of their representative men in the last House did to promote it.

I have thus briefly replied to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and, in so doing, have sought to put myself "right on the record" for the satisfaction of my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. ADRIN,] whose criticism in his speech, on Thursday last, upon my use of the words, "national grand larceny," I am glad to know was intended to afford me the opportunity to make this brief explanation. No explanation would have been necessary if my remark had not been perverted from its jocular and figurative sense.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me one moment to reply to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MOORE. I must decline to yield the floor any further.

In the discharge of our legislative duties, we have had suddenly sprung upon us, growing out of recent occurrences, questions of the gravest importance. They, sir, involve great principles of law, not only of international, but of constitutional as well as municipal law. Called, as we are, to review the conduct of a distinguished officer of the American Navy, and in some manner, I confess, to pass in review and sit in judgment upon the conduct of the executive department of the Government, it becomes us to lay aside all passion, all prejudice, and, above all, any party bias.

I listened with pleasure, Mr. Chairman, to the able remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GROESBECK,] on yesterday; but find myself constrained to dissent from most of the legal opinions announced by him as to the proper construction of the neutrality laws of 1818, and the power of the President to employ the land and naval force to enforce them beyond the jurisdiction of the United States. I shall, therefore, in the course of my remarks, endeavor to answer some of the arguments offered by him, and present, in addition, such views as the occasion and the great importance of these questions seem to demand. I agree with the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. KELLOGG,] who has just taken his seat, that the question before us is not as to the merits of General Walker, his character, or the lawfulness of his expeditions. I am certainly not here to defend either. I leave that to others. Nor shall I enter upon a discussion of the validity of the title which he claims of being the lawful President of that Republic. Whether we favor fil-bustering or not, advocate or oppose the repeal of the neutrality laws, approve or condemn his conduct, are not the questions presented here for our consideration; but one far transcending these in dignity and importance, involving, as I believe, the constitutional rights and liberties of the people of this widely-extended Republic. Shall the law and the Constitution be trampled under foot with impunity? Shall American citizens be seized in a foreign nation in defiance of law; made prisoners of, brought back to this country, and then turned loose without any accusation against them? Shall an officer of the American Navy assume to himself the war-making power—a power which a sovereign State of the Union could not exercise, except in cases of rebellion or of imminent danger not admitting of delay; land an armament in a country with which we are at peace; make war upon a military force, composed too of American citizens, by a violation of her territory, and afford just cause of war to a neighboring Republic, and thus act without instructions, and in violation of the Constitution of his country and of the law of nations? These are the questions which we are called upon to decide.

Of Commodore Paulding, prior to this occurrence, I know but little. No doubt he has been a gallant and faithful officer; but speaking in reference to his conduct in Nicaragua, I say a more wanton and willful outrage was never committed by any one clothed with authority in this country; and it becomes us, it seems to me, as the representatives of a free people, to protest against this wanton usurpation of power.

I admit that the President was bound to see that the neutrality laws were faithfully executed. He was bound to exercise vigilance to prevent their violation. Had he not discharged this duty he would have failed to meet the just expectations of the country. I acquit him most cheerfully of all intentional error or improper motives; but I do not concur in the construction which he and gentlemen on this floor have given to those laws, and the extent of the authority claimed to be conferred by them.

Under the law of 1818, the President was authorized to employ the land and naval forces to prevent the carrying on from our shores of any military expeditions, fitted out in our country against a nation with which we were at peace; and also to drive from our coasts any vessels that should presume to violate our laws, and which should refuse to leave when ordered to do so.

The authority conferred to employ the land and naval forces was limited to certain specified and well-defined cases. Their employment was intended, as it seems to me, to be confined only to our own shores, or within one marine league beyond.

The clause of the statute relied upon by those who contend that the President has the authority to send out on the high seas and arrest such expeditions, is that which provides that the President may use the Army and Navy for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territory or jurisdiction of the United States; but that clause must not be taken and construed by itself, separate and apart from all the rest of the sentence and the other sections of the act. It must be construed in connection with the whole act; and when thus examined, no such powers can be found to have been conferred upon the chief Magistrate of the United States.

If the Executive could send out upon the high seas, and beyond our own jurisdiction, the naval forces to arrest such expeditions, he could, by the same authority, send out the military forces—the regular Army; for the same act which authorized him to employ one gave him equal authority to employ the other of these arms of the service.

The act of March, 1819—to protect our merchant vessels from pirates—gave authority to send our vessels to any part of the ocean to punish offenders against these laws. Not so with the act of 1818, by which, as I contend, the power of the President is limited to our own jurisdiction.

"But," said the honorable gentleman, [Mr. GROESBECK,] "you then proclaim the doctrine that on the seas there is a sanctuary for crime." Not at all, sir. Crime committed on board of any of our public or private vessels at sea, will subject the offenders to punishment in the United States courts. This is by express statute. Writers on international law lay down the principle that vessels at sea are considered part of the territory of that nation under whose flag they may sail, and all offenses on board may be tried and punished by the laws of that country.

As to piracy, who does not know that the authorities of any nation may try and execute any one who has committed piracy? Pirates are regarded in the law as the enemies of all mankind, and may be arrested and brought to trial wherever they are found. I allude, of course, to those who are guilty of piracy as defined by the law of nations. But there are offenses which are declared piracy by the municipal laws, which cannot be punished except by the nation under whose flag they were committed. The African slave trade is not piracy by the law of nations; but the laws of some nations declare it piracy. If an American citizen be arrested by English authorities on that charge, he finds an agis and protection under our flag, and must be handed over to our authorities for prosecution and punishment.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROESBECK] referred yesterday to a decision in U. S. v. Wheaton, which he claimed as upholding the doctrine that a vessel offending against the laws of a country can be pursued and captured anywhere on the high seas. I must think that the gentleman did not give a very careful reading to that decision. That was a case where a Portuguese vessel fired upon an American man-of-war—the Alligator—commanded by Lieutenant Stockton. That gallant lieutenant subdued and captured the Portuguese vessel and brought her into an American port as a prize. The Portuguese vessel claimed that it was by mistake the American vessel was fired at; and in the decision of that case it is acknowledged that on the high seas vessels offending against our laws may be pursued and captured. But this is by special legislation and in pursuance of the act of 1819, before referred to.

But, Mr. Chairman, I go further. I say that until this offense was committed, until this high-handed act of Commodore Paulding had been perpetrated, it was not claimed that the President had any such power under this neutrality law. Lieutenant Almy, like a vigilant, cautious, sensible man, called upon the Secretary of the Navy to explain under what circumstances he was required to act, and whether it was intended to give him instructions to seize a vessel if he had good reason to believe it to be engaged in a filibuster expedition. And how did Secretary Toucey answer the question? By evading a direct response to this plain question. I would not speak disrespectfully of that distinguished functionary, for I have very great respect for him, on account of his sound constitutional sentiments. But I say, nevertheless, that in his reply to the letter of Lieutenant Almy he evaded the question, and the direction to seize a vessel under such circumstances is nowhere to be found in the instructions given to any naval officer. The Constitution of the United States guarantees to every citizen protection from seizure in his person and in his property, unless upon due complaint, made and supported by oath or affirmation.

Then, sir, how can it be claimed that upon the high seas, upon any part of the wide ocean, an American officer is clothed with the authority, upon mere suspicion, to arrest American citizens, seize their property and their vessel, and bring them to this country for trial at his mere discretion? The President himself does not possess any such power to arrest even the humblest citizen of our country.

Well, sir, what was done in this case? Commodore Paulding sends these men to this country as prisoners. Their leader is brought to this city, and the President, through the Secretary of State, tells him that there is no accusation against him that will justify the Government in holding him in custody. The men, too, are set at liberty at Norfolk; their rights have been trampled under foot. They have been incarcerated on board an American ship, carried thousands of miles, and turned adrift in mid-winter, naked and without means to take them to their distant homes. And yet the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROESBECK] yesterday said that no cruelty had been practiced towards them. I say, Mr. Chairman, that such treatment does not speak well for this Government. Why, sir, when a few years ago a vessel was wrecked upon our shores, (from Japan, I believe,) those unfortunate sailors, thus cast on our shores, were returned to their native country, to their homes and friends, at the expense of the Government.

The conduct of Commodore Paulding, Mr. Chairman, cannot be justified by the law of nations; it cannot be justified by the law of the United States, it cannot be justified by the Constitution of the United States, nor can it be justified by his instructions. And, sir, he committed the act deliberately. If he had committed it in ignorance or upon a sudden occasion, without time for deliberation, it would furnish some excuse or palliation for his conduct. I say, sir, that in the history of the Government, from its foundation to the present time, there is not a parallel to this outrage, as I believe.

They refer to Captain Ingraham and General Jackson. I like to see men assume responsibility when the occasion calls for it. I applaud them as much as any man can. Every American applauded the conduct of Captain Ingraham when he took Koszta and defended him from the authorities of Austria. What were the circumstances under which he acted?

Martin Koszta, an humble individual, invested with our nationality, was seized, without law, in a foreign port, by Austrian officials. Captain Ingraham, true to his American heart, prepared his ship for action, and determined to rescue him, even at the cannon's mouth. He did rescue him; and for that I give him credit. But it is said that the territory of another nation was invaded. Not so. The authorities of that nation, in that port, had stood by and refused to throw their protection around Koszta. They stood by and saw the Austrian authorities take him by violence and imprison him. It was right, then, for Captain Ingraham to take the responsibility of rescuing him. The cases do not bear comparison. One was in defense of an American citizen, while the last was in direct violation of the constitutional rights of American citizens.

It is said that General Jackson took the responsibility of marching into Florida: so he did. It was to punish the enemies of his country. He saw at the fort of Barrancas, near Pensacola, floating side by side, the flags of Great Britain and Spain, and saw the authorities there furnishing the Indians with arms and ammunition, and affording a place of refuge for those who were committing outrages upon our territories. He marched his army there and took possession of their fort. He did right. He took the responsibility at New Orleans in declaring martial law, which step every American citizen applauds. That was a case where responsibility ought to have been taken. That, too, was done to protect American citizens, and to protect that city from falling into the hands of the British and being sacked and pillaged.

The Congress of the United States can alone declare war. This arrogant commander, clothed with a little brief authority, takes the war-making power into his own hands. He not only makes war upon William Walker and his followers, not only lands his force in Nicaragua, and in martial array surrounds Walker and compels him to surrender—an offense for which he should be recalled at least, or censured—but he also commits a gross outrage in invading the soil of Nicaragua. Talk to me about the example of Walker, talk to me about the honor of our country, I tell you that viewing the conduct of Walker and that of Paulding, the latter is most deserving of our censure. I speak not of the motives which influenced them. I look upon the act of Commodore Paulding, and the example which he has set, as one fraught with danger to the perpetuation of our liberties. I say, sir, that if this act is sustained in an American Congress by the representatives of the people, and an American officer is permitted with impunity to take the war-making power into his own hands, the consequences will be ruinous. How soon will it be before some other will, like him, take the responsibility to do a like unlawful act?

"'Twill be recorded for a precedent;

And many an error, by the same example,
Will rush into the State."

It becomes us to mark with our signal displeasure and disapprobation the first dawning of an attempt on the part of one branch of the Government to invade the powers delegated to another. My respect for our present Chief Magistrate is too great to allow me to suppose that he would desire to make any encroachments upon the legislative department of the Government, by himself or by his subordinate officers. If we would preserve from violation the chart of our liberties, we should sternly oppose any officer of the Government, from the highest to the lowest, who attempts to usurp powers not conferred upon him.

Mr. Chairman, the honorable member from Ohio [Mr. GROESBECK] referred to the conduct of Mr. Fillmore towards those unfortunate American prisoners taken in the expedition of Lopez, who were shot by the Spanish authorities in Cuba. It was an unfortunate allusion for him. Who does not remember that when those unfortunate, but brave young men, with the noble Crittenden at their head, were taken, and without the semblance of a trial, shot by the Spanish authorities, what a thrill of horror was felt in the country? The American Consul, Mr. Owens, was condemned for not attempting to save them. Mr. Fillmore was blamed for denouncing them as pirates and outlaws. That consul, though a worthy gentleman, has ever since remained in retirement, with the heavy censures of his countrymen resting upon him, though he claimed to have obeyed the instructions of his Government.

And how is it altered now, Mr. Chairman? A gallant little band of fifty men—the same number that fell with Crittenden in Havana—was left by Commodore Paulding, without reinforcements to succor them, in the Fort of Castillo, which their valor had won; their supplies cut off, and they surrounded by an overwhelming force of the Costa Ricans and Nicaraguans. With the next tidings may come the news that these men may have shared the fate of the gallant Crittenden.

I have just had handed to me by a friend an account that Anderson and his command have been taken prisoners by an American vessel. It is said that the President gave no instructions authorizing Paulding's illegal acts, and that he has since disapproved of his conduct. How disapproved of it? For so violent an outrage how has the displeasure of the President been marked? By a recall? by a trial? by a court-martial? by suspension from command? No, sir; by a simple declaration that he was unauthorized, and acted beyond his instructions in what he has done. Is it not remembered here that when the British Government repudiated the conduct of Mr. Crampton but refused to recall him, how we with one accord sustained the President in demanding his recall? The British Government refused to exercise that power, and our Government dismissed him; and I say that so gross and violent an outrage as that committed by Commodore Paulding demands at least his recall and censure.

Let the President excuse him if he so wills; but I say it becomes us, it seems to me, as the representatives of the people, jealous of our and their rights; having sworn to support the Constitution of the United States which he has wantonly violated, to vote resolutions of censure of Commodore Paulding, not for vengeance, not to dishonor him, but for the example. Honest as he may be as a private citizen, faithful as he may have been in the public service heretofore, we should mark our disapprobation of his act as we would condemn and oppose any unwarranted assumption of power or authority on the part of any officer of the Government. It is for these reasons that I would censure him.

Commodore Paulding, we are told, is the son of that true patriot who arrested André, the British spy, and whose patriotism was proof against the tempting offers of British gold. While it is honorable to be thus descended from so noble a father, yet I hope it will not be contended on this floor, that any man, no matter how honorably descended he may have been, can claim any exemption from punishment when he tramples under foot the laws of his country.

The rights of American citizens ought not to be infringed with impunity. The citizen of the ancient Roman Republic, in whatever land he might be, no matter how the hand of power was sought to be laid upon him, could stand up and proclaim "I am a Roman citizen!" and forthwith he found protection in his rights, and his person was considered inviolate. Shall it not be so with an American citizen? Should he not at least be entitled to the same protection, with such a constitution as we have, guarantying to him his rights in so solemn and so sacred a manner?

By what law, what authority, I ask again, did Commodore Paulding arrest Walker and his men in the Republic of Nicaragua? It was the law of might. It was the law by which Alexander untied the Gordian knot, by severing it with his sword. That was the law by which he endeavored to get over the difficulty which seemed to surround him. Walker had escaped from this country. He had eluded the vigilance of the officers and had landed in Nicaragua. The published correspondence shows that these naval officers sought a quarrel with Walker—sought an excuse for doing what they at last did, without cause and without excuse.

Failing in this attempt, he resolved, in the plenitude of his might, to land upon Nicaraguan soil and capture Walker and his men, and send them home prisoners of war. The decision we may make on his conduct will be referred to long after we shall have passed from the busy stage of action. It will stand as a beacon of warning or as an example to encourage military and naval commanders to violate the law and the constitution of their country. Pass over this gross violation of the law, indicate no censure of Commodore Paulding's conduct, and then we show that prejudice against Walker, against filibustering, submission to party spirit, or some other cause, has blinded our judgments.

Mr. Chairman, I honor the American Navy. Though small in number, I believe no corps of its size in the world is more efficient, or composed of better material. Its officers, for the most part, are intelligent, skillful, brave, and patriotic. Its achievements in the past furnish the brightest pages in our country's history and afford a guarantee of what we may expect from that arm of the service hereafter, should our country be again involved in war. I regret to think, that by such an occurrence as this, the high estimate in which it has been hitherto held may in some degree be abated: for the people of this whole country, who love liberty, who are jealous of their rights, will think with me, that if such lawless usurpations of power are to go unpunished, it had been better that we never had a navy afloat on the ocean—better far that our commerce had never found its way to the distant isles of the sea—than for these dear-bought liberties to be endangered or destroyed.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to offer a few observations on the question before the committee. I believe the question arises on the proposed alteration or repeal of the neutrality laws of 1818. If the gentleman who last spoke [Mr. MOORE] is correct in the principles which he lays down on this subject, then these neutrality laws need no repeal, because his whole argument has been exhausted in the attempt to show that Commodore Paulding had no authority, by virtue of instructions from the President or by virtue of the neutrality law, to arrest Walker. Now, in the examination which I propose to make of this case, let me first state the facts, to see if we are agreed upon them, and let us then deduce those principles of law which they are supposed to embody.

I suppose that the facts of the case which have given rise to this debate, may be briefly summed up. William Walker, in 1856, goes to Nicaragua and obtains some foothold there. In a short time (his arms and ammunition are, however, soon wasted, and his men are decimated by the climate and by the evil habits which an army of plunderers always engender) he is brought home, promises good behavior in future, is afterwards arrested and put under bonds to keep the peace, especially in regard to this matter of the invasion of Nicaragua. In a short time, however, he goes south, collects one hundred and fifty-seven or one hundred and fifty-eight men, goes back to the scene of his former exploits, his triumphs, and his defeats; there organizes an army, and appoints his colonels, his captains, his lieutenants, his sergeants, and their assistants, and takes forcible military possession of one or two towns belonging to a neighboring nation, with which we are at peace. And this he does, announcing to the world in the very act of invasion and possession, that he does it as a conqueror, and because, as he maintains, he possesses authority to do it. And he says then, and since, in his letter to the President of the United States, that he will hold that military occupation against all comers.

Now, our Government having, by a friendly interposition, rescued this man from the peril in which he had formerly placed himself, endeavors honestly, as we will suppose, to restrain him and his comrades, and to prevent them from landing again in Nicaragua; and orders are sent out for that purpose, which I will examine in a moment. They land, however, under the very guns of our ship; and the officer who permitted that landing is censured. Commodore Paulding, supposing that he was thereby carrying out the orders given to him, steps on shore, arrests the commander and his force, and brings him home for trial. He is conveyed to the city of New York; and the United States marshal of that district brings him on, by easy stages, to the seat of Government. He walks with him into the office of the venerable Secretary of State, and says, "Your servant, Mr. Cass! I deliver up to you General William Walker." The bland Secretary bows, and says, "I am not the national jailor! I have nothing to do with Mr. William Walker;" and that individual forthwith walks forth to see what new phase fortune has turned up for him. He finds himself not without sympathizers even here in the Capitol of the nation, and among the sworn friends of the Executive.

Gentlemen, even here in the national councils, offer resolutions implying censure upon the President and the officer by and under whom this man was captured. Suddenly, from a felon, William Walker becomes a hero. From a reckless outlaw, guilty of robbery and murder, he becomes a second Moses leading a nation from a wilderness of difficulties into a land of promise. From a scourge and curse, he becomes a pioneer of civilization, a pattern of good government, and a benefactor of his race. Honorable members declare here, that a great wrong has been done him, and talk openly of giving him indemnity. National vessels are to be employed to carry back these men to the scene of their former perils, and their outraged dignity is to be appeased by indemnity to be received at the hands of the Government.

Sir, what does all this mean? Why all this excitement, so instantaneous and sudden and deep, about an event which, at any other time, would have excited only a smile of derision or contempt? Sir, it indicates that there is a divided sentiment in this House, and in this nation, upon a great principle, as to what shall be the character of the future civilization of this continent; whether it shall be martial or peaceful; whether it shall be by conquest or by colonization; whether it shall bear the olive branch, the plow, the spade and the ax, or whether it shall bear the sword, the rifle and the bayonet; whether it shall hold its empire by the force of armed legions, bringing their wealth from the labors of unrequited toil, or whether it shall spread over hill and valley the school, the college, and the church, with all the elements and agencies of civilization and refinement. In fine, shall we begin now to imitate the despotisms we have defeated and disproved, or shall we pursue the high career of moderation and good faith which has hitherto characterized us? These are questions, sir, which we are bound to settle here and now, upon our responsibility, as wise legislators and honest men.

Now, sir, I regret that I have not the time on this occasion to discuss the merits of these antagonistic systems, and show their influences upon the invader and upon the people invaded, upon the character of their laws, their institutions, their literature, their philosophy, their social life, and their political characteristics and manifestations. All that I can now do is simply to show and attempt to prove that William Walker is not a pioneer of that civilization of which we, as Americans, are proud; but of that coarser, ruder, semi-barbarous civilization which obtains its foothold by force and maintains it in defiance of law, upon plundered liberties of the people it conquers and enslaves.

Now, sir, in the first place, was Walker guilty of the crime of which he stands charged? In order to settle this we have only to ask one question. Did he start to go to Nicaragua with the intent to make a hostile demonstration? Now, sir, in order to obtain a conclusive answer to that question, we have only to take the letter of Walker himself. Walker generously and manfully scorns the apologies which have been offered for him before the nation in this House. He declares, in a letter addressed to the President of the United States, that he intended, from the very moment when he was taken from the soil of Nicaragua, to go back, and go back as a conqueror. He says:

"Let me remind you of the fact that from the moment we touched our natal soil we protested against the illegality and injustice of the act, and declared our intention to return to the land whence we had been wrongfully brought. Everywhere, before the functionaries of the Government, in the presence of assembled multitudes of the sovereign people, we declared that no effort should be unused in order to regain the rights wrested from us by fraud and illegality."

"With a regular register and clearance we supposed when once on the high seas that we were beyond the possible interference of any United States authority; for even if we were admitted belligerents against a Power with which the United States was at peace, the owners of the neutral vessel had a clear right to carry warlike persons, as well as contraband of war, subject only to the risk of capture by the enemy's cruisers."

"While we were being embarrassed by the action of the Saratoga we had not been idle. Colonel Anderson—who had served his native country throughout the Mexican war—at the head of fifty men, had ascended the river and gained possession of the stronghold which in the last century had for days defied the genius of the proudest naval name in British annals. Not only this, but he had regained possession of valuable American property."

"And as long as our faith in right endures, and our confidence in the God of our fathers remains unshaken, so long shall we use all just and proper means to regain what has been wrongfully wrested from us."

Now, sir, Walker's letter repudiates the excuses which have been made for him. He places his defense upon two grounds. First, that they were citizens of Nicaragua; and secondly, that in going in a neutral vessel they were exempt from seizure upon the high seas, except the danger they might incur of seizure as contraband before regaining the shores of Nicaragua. He does not claim that they went there without arms in their vessel. He does not claim that they went there not intending before they went to set on foot a military expedition. And taking the answer which he furnishes to the question by his own letter, there is no difficulty whatever upon the subject.

It has been pretended here by gentlemen upon this floor that this is a case like that of La Fayette, who came here to aid us in our struggle for independence. Why, sir, General Walker does not put it upon that ground, nor is there any similarity between the two cases. It is admitted by writers on national law, that when the parties have begun a struggle for the possession of a Government, that other persons may go in and aid one or the other as they may please; and if General Walker had gone to Nicaragua for any purpose like this, no one would have the right to oppose him. But he went there—how? To assist a party engaged in such a struggle? No, sir, he went there as a conqueror, to subvert all authorities and to assume the reins of Government. He went there just as Cortez went to Mexico, just as Pizarro went to Peru.

Why, sir, we have aided other territories in the same way frequently. We aided Greece when the spark of liberty again burned in the bosom of the dwellers of that ancient cradle of art and song. We aided Mexico when she was struggling to throw off the yoke of the oppressor. Walker claims to have set his foot upon the soil of Central America, not for the purpose of assisting one or the other of the contending parties, but as a conqueror of all parties. I say that he was guilty by both codes; by the code of international law, which is binding upon him; and he was guilty of also violating the law of 1818, commonly known as the neutrality law of the United States.

Was he a citizen of Nicaragua? and, if so, does that fact excuse him? Or is the other pretense set up by him valid, that having passed into that country, we are to be stopped, by that fact, from arresting him there? In regard to the first proposition, I need only ask this question. Will any gentleman tell me when, where, and in what Nicaraguan court William Walker declared his intention of becoming a citizen? Will any gentleman tell me where his papers were taken out? where his oath to support the constitution of Nicaragua is filed or registered?

Sir, he took an oath in Nicaragua as William the Norman took it when he invaded England. That oath was written with the point of his sword in blood and carnage; and that oath was to subvert, and not to sustain! Talk about William Walker being a citizen of the State of Nicaragua! He never was a citizen of that State, and no record can be produced to show that fact, here or elsewhere.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman mean to assert that any record is necessary for naturalization in Nicaragua?

Mr. THOMPSON. Walker being a citizen of the United States, it is necessary for him to prove here, when he maintains that he subsequently became a citizen of any other State, not only the fact, but the process by which he became such. I call for the proof!

Now, sir, in reference to this fact, I will advert also, to what was mentioned in the very able argument made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GROESBECK,] upon the floor yesterday—an argument which I consider perfectly unanswerable on the propositions discussed by him. The sixth section of the neutrality act does not confine itself to citizens of the United States. The language of the section is: "Any person who shall set on foot" these military expeditions: be he Turk or Jew, Christian or heathen; no matter from what country he started, no matter to what nation he owes allegiance, any person who sets on foot such an expedition, is amenable to the law. And therefore it can be of no consequence whether William Walker at the time was a citizen of the State of Nicaragua, provided he organized that expedition and intended to carry it on while he was a citizen and within the jurisdiction of the United States. The President says that the great object of this law was to save foreign States with whom we were at peace from the ravages of those lawless expeditions proceeding from our own shores.

Let me dwell a moment on the second proposition. Being a citizen of the United States, and having with him one hundred and fifty-eight men, also citizens of the United States, exposed to the penalties of a breach of this neutrality law, if arrested within the marine league, or if arrested upon the high seas, did the fact that he succeeded in reaching those shores exonerate him from arrest? So far from it, that having to the extent of his power not only "set on foot," but "carried on," this unlawful expedition, he only commits an overt act, the proof incontrovertible of the intention with which he set out; and, if indicted and tried by twelve men, they could not leave the jury-box upon this proof without pronouncing him guilty. Why, sir, if he had been arrested by Captain Chatard in the Gulf of Mexico, before he arrived at the scene of his exploits, or within the marine league, as the gentleman has said, what evidence would the commander of the Saratoga have possessed that he intended to violate the neutrality laws? I wish any gentleman to point out that evidence to me. There they were without arms, without ammunition. The papers were all regular. Everything was fair and right on the face. There would not have been a particle of evidence upon which he could have been punished for a violation of the neutrality law, if he had been arrested before reaching Nicaragua.

But I cannot see, as some gentlemen do, that the President acts consistently in this matter, when he orders that he shall be prevented from landing; and when he actually landed, and was taken by the force of the United States, that he shall be left to go free. I think that the Administration are bound to have this man prosecuted for this invasion of the rights of a neutral Power, one with whom we are at peace. I think we are bound to have him tried by a jury of his country. What I desire to say on this point is, that his criminality does not lie in the place of his arrest, but in that which he did prior to it, and for which he was arrested. Why, sir, the rogue who broke into the house of my colleague [Mr. CLARK, of New York] the other night, and robbed him of his property when he was absent, might as well, when he was arrested and brought to trial for that act, say, "It is true, I did this; but the officer who arrested me had no star upon his bosom; he had no warrant from a magistrate, and no complaint had been made." Why, sir, the fact of his guilt is all that we look for; and the mode of his arrest is a matter of no consequence whatever.

I say, then, that the President is right in asserting that he is criminal, and that the principle is sound; that, provided he be arrested, it is a matter of no consequence whatever that it was within the Nicaraguan sovereignty. In my judgment, under the circumstances of this case, it is of no consequence whatever, while Nicaragua does not complain, whether the technical letter of the law has been conformed with or not; and as the President quotes the golden rule from Scripture to show the foundation of national law, in his letter to the Senate on this matter, I will imitate him so far as to say that sometimes the "letter killeth, while the spirit maketh alive."

Commodore Paulding, therefore, is justified by the higher law, by the spirit of his orders, and by the spirit of national law, in effecting this arrest; and also by the circumstances of this case, which are so peculiar and so anomalous, that if they had no precedent they need none. The President thinks he transcended his instructions; but I think he carried out the spirit of those instructions; nor do I see that he violated the letter. Sir, I honor the common sense of the brave tar who goes right to the mark and accomplishes that for which he was sent, without balancing nice points of national etiquette, and without splitting hairs when he should be delivering a broadside. These delicate lines of conflicting jurisdictions are better left to the adjustment of those who live in the enjoyment of that peace and prosperity which our brave and gallant Navy has earned for us.

But, sir, the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] who introduced this subject to our attention, sounded high notes of alarm. He saw impending perils and would hasten to avert them. He says, on this subject:

"There are three important questions which are to be considered; first, in reference to the rights of Walker and his men; secondly, in reference to the rights of Nicaragua; and third, it appears that one of our own officers, whether with or without the authority of the President, has, at the head of a large body of armed men, gone into a territory which does not belong to the United States, and carried away, by force, one or two hundred persons. This will strike everybody as an act of war."

And so said the last gentleman who addressed us. Now, sir, I shall proceed very briefly to pay my respects to each of these propositions in their order.

First, in regard to the rights of Walker. What do they turn out to be? If the President be correct in what he has communicated to us upon this subject, and if history does not lie, the rights of William Walker are, to be arrested and tried by a jury of his peers, if they can be found in this country. His rights are, to be defended by competent counsel, and to be cleared before a jury; otherwise, to suffer the penalties of the law. That is the extent of William Walker's right in this matter.

Now, sir, in regard to the rights of Nicaragua I had taken an extract from the letter of the Minister representing that Republic, which has been adverted to by the gentleman who has addressed us this morning, [Mr. KELLOGG,] requesting Secretary Cass, on the 14th of September last, to give positive orders to our vessels of war, lying at or near the San Juan del Norte, to prevent the landing of the filibusters on that coast, as transgressors of the laws of this country, and as disturbers of the peace and security of friendly nations. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROESBECK] said yesterday, that wherever a country did not complain, wherever we knocked with a friendly intent, there we had the right to enter. By the extract to which I have referred, I show not only that the country does not complain, but that they positively requested the interference of the United States Government for the purpose of protecting their shores from this armed invasion. Why, sir, suppose I see an individual coming towards my premises with hostile intention, and I cry out to my neighbor to prevent him from coming in, and he, pursuing him with hot haste, crosses my threshold before he is able to arrest him: would it not be quibbling with him should I say, "true, I asked you to interfere, but I did not ask you to come into my premises; you crossed my threshold, and have committed a trespass upon my rights!" Is that the kind of reasoning by which we settle great national rights and national principles? By no means. Not only is license to be presumed in this case, but the license is actually given, and is upon the records.

But, sir, in regard to this as an act of war. I have heard of various ways of levying war. I have read in Kent and other authors of the various modes in which war is levied—by a declaration of the war-making power; by giving aid and comfort to an enemy; by commissioning privateering upon the high seas; and by sacking and holding towns and villages belonging to the enemy. But I have never heard, and I think the civilized world is yet to learn, that when our officers are pursuing a criminal in a foreign territory, and doing it in pursuance of a request of that territory, that act is an act of levying war. War on whom? War on Walker as a man? Why, that is a war which a magistrate always declares against a felon. Not a war upon Walker, surely. War upon Nicaragua? Certainly not, when we step upon her shores for the purpose of protecting her from the power and arms of an invader who escaped from our shores. Did we make war upon any interest of Nicaragua? Did we take her property, or attack her ports? Certainly not. Where is the war, then? Sir, I see no speck of war. Gentlemen's visions may be keener than mine; they may see war painted all over the dim southern sky, but to my eye all is tranquil and serene. That tropical land sleeps by day luxuriously beneath its fervid sun, and by night under its pale southern cross, as if neither war nor rumors of war had ever disturbed its profound quietude.

But the gentleman is troubled with other difficulties. Great Britain will find this out, and then she may do whatever she pleases; and he fears this is a breach of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Will gentlemen point me to a section or line of that treaty which this arrest is supposed to violate. Sir, it cannot be done. Why is one nation prohibited from invading another's territory? Simply because it is an invasion of national sovereignty; and also because, in most cases, there exist treaties between different nations for the rendition of fugitives from justice. But, in this case, our criminal might be too strong for their sovereignty, and might become a criminal by his attempted subversion of the very Government; and they therefore owe us gratitude and not censure for our interference in their behalf.

Sir, the course of this debate indicates that there are three parties in the House, and in the country. The first is composed of those who are not afraid to call themselves "national filibusters." The term is expressive, if not classical. They go for conquest, dominion—theft (shall I say? not in an offensive sense) on a grand scale—wholesale robbery. They despise all petit larcenies as mean and mercenary. But, with them, crime becomes virtuous by aggravation; devilry grows angelic by bulk—a single murder is ignominious; but if thousands perish, it is glorious. One marauder is a felon; but five hundred together become patriots. Sir, I am afraid that this doctrine has been learned in the school of the Ostend manifesto. I am afraid, sir, that it is only the efflorescence—the budding out and the fruit—of the doctrine which some gentlemen find in that notable document. If the fathers of the Republic preach heresy of that description, what may be expected from the children, even though they come from my native State? If the fathers eat such sour grapes, why, the children's teeth will be, of course, set on edge. Well, I suppose that His Excellency the President has receded from those doctrines; because, in this last communication that he makes to us, he has gone back from doctrines of national obligation to the moral law and the golden rule!

But, sir, there is a second party which believes in the legitimacy of both public and private plunder. They see nothing wrong in either. They believe that fortune favors the sharpest and the quickest; that if the victim be foreign, and the plunder be land, the laws of good faith and of national morality are inoperative; that the world is one great field of adventure, where the sharpest sword and the boldest front wins the day. They see no distinction between private and public marauding, and nothing reprehensible in either. Of the two schools I respect this last the most, because it has no affectation of a morality which it neither believes in nor respects.

But thank God there is yet a third school which believes in a peaceful and Christian and republican propagandism; which looks to the silent and serene march of commercial, social, industrial, and moral forces for the spread of our civilization and the prevalence of our principles; which is not deceived by the pride and pomp and circumstances of war, but sees its aggravation, its horrors, and its license; whose insight traces through all history and discovers throughout all time the great truth that justice and good faith can alone build up a lasting dominion and give permanence to empire. So far from abolishing our neutrality laws, I would uphold and vindicate them in every letter and in every line. I would play no farces by keeping the letter and violating the spirit—I would honor and thank, and not reprimand the brave officer who crushed out the sin and the danger without treating very politely the sinner. These laws do not stand in the way of a just, peaceful, and permanent civilization, but are preventive only of rapine, violence, and blood.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I have not sought the floor on this occasion with a view of entering at any great length upon the discussion of these exciting topics which have engaged the attention of the committee since the commencement of this Congress. It is true, sir, that I never refrain from the expression, unqualifiedly, of my opinions when they are properly formed on any subject; and therefore I propose, incidentally as it were, to allude to the questions that have been discussed by gentlemen on this floor since the commencement of this Congress, with a view ultimately to discuss one in which my constituents and my section of the country are directly interested.

In regard to the discussion that has taken place to-day, and for several days past, touching Nicaragua and Walker, and the action of our naval officers, I propose to say simply this: I propose to give my opinion as far as it is formed, and no further. When that matter comes to be acted upon definitely, I will doubtless have my opinion formed; and if so, I will be as prompt in expressing and acting on it as any other gentleman on this floor. That Commodore Paulding—in the language of the Chief Magistrate of the nation, and of distinguished gentlemen who have addressed the committee—acted in the arrest of Walker without authority of law, and that he did wrong in so acting, I have no hesitation in saying unqualifiedly. The President has gone thus far; and I think that, when the President went that far, he went far enough. I would not attempt to dictate to this House; but I think that, when gentlemen go beyond that with the lights before us, they go too far. What ought to be done with Commodore Paulding, I am not now prepared to say. That his action should be commended, I am prepared to deny; for no naval or other officer who goes beyond the authority vested in him by law, should ever be commended by the nation. Never! And why? Because it sets a bad precedent. I care not what may have been the motive of such officer; I care not how pure and honest, patriotic and upright he may be; when he transcends the authority vested in him by law, I think the American Congress should not commend his act. But what should be done with Commodore Paulding? That is a question on which I do not propose to express an opinion on this occasion.

What should be done in regard to Walker, is another question which has been discussed at some length. Gentlemen hold different opinions and have expressed different views in regard to this matter. Mr. Chairman, I am not now prepared to give an opinion touching that subject. I would say this, however, to the Democratic members of the House, because I believe it to be true in point of fact, that it is the duty of every Democrat—I care not whether he hails from the South or from the North—to be extremely cautious how he touches this matter. There is nothing easier than to put a plank in the platform of the Opposition party unless caution is observed. It may be expected, and gentlemen would naturally expect, from the long time that I have lived in Arkansas, that I am an unqualified filibuster. Well, sir, in one sense of the term I am an unqualified filibuster; and yet, when I say that, I will violate no law to accomplish any object. Therefore, I say, I decline expressing my opinion, so far as I may be concerned, as to what should be the action of the South in reference to Walker and his men. When that question comes up legitimately; when a proposition comes up to reinstate Walker, or to indemnify him, I trust I shall be prepared to act upon it. And, sir, when a proposition comes up to modify our neutrality laws, I shall be prepared to act upon that, also. But, sir, it strikes me that it is not only possible, but probable, that statesmen and members of Congress may express opinions upon questions without mature deliberation.

But, sir, I did not design to discuss that question, or any other of the topics that have thus far engaged the attention of the committee. I might allude to Kansas; I might say to this committee that I was a member of the Thirty-Third Congress, and battled long and faithfully for the passage of the bill by which Kansas and Nebraska were organized as Territories. Why did I do so? Not because I believed that bill was absolutely and imperatively necessary at that time. I did it, sir, because I saw embodied in that bill a principle which I had recognized from my boyhood—the great constitutional doctrine of popular sovereignty. Therefore was it that I did not oppose that bill. I voted for that bill, and advocated it, not because I thought it was necessary to organize that country into Territories at that time, but because it embodied that great principle. And now, sir, I am prepared to act upon all questions relating to Kansas, and to act in accordance with the opinions I then entertained, and in accordance with the great doctrine of popular sovereignty. I am prepared, sir, to dispose of this Kansas question, so far as Congress is concerned, immediately. Sir, expressing the opinions which I candidly entertain, I cannot, for the life of me, say that I sympathize with the people of "bleeding Kansas," as they are sometimes called on both sides of the House. I regret, it is true, the state of affairs now existing in that Territory, and which has existed since it was organized; and yet I do not sympathize with that people, because they have not had the nerve, the boldness, the manliness, to assert and defend their rights as freemen, and to form their own government, as they had the right to do. They have been subjected to an outside pressure, brought to bear by disappointed politicians and ambitious aspirants; and they have failed to do their duty to themselves. They have gotten themselves into a difficulty from which I do not propose to extricate them. I propose, further, in carrying out this doctrine as I understand it to be embraced in the Kansas and Nebraska bill, to vote now to admit the State of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, and let Kansas fight it out as well as she can. That is my policy in reference to Kansas.

Well, sir, it may be expected that I have sought the floor to speak about Utah, one of the great questions which have excited an interest in this Congress. I do not propose to do so. I have, however, one regret to utter: while I indorse the administration of Mr. Pierce; while I admire that statesman because he had the nerve, hailing as he did from the North, not only to announce, but to carry out, the great constitutional doctrine that men from the South had constitutional rights as well as northern men, I regret that he did not, as soon as he was inaugurated, remove Brigham Young, then Governor of the Territory of Utah. Had he done so, I doubt not that the unfortunate and deluded people of that Territory would have been at this day loyal and peaceable citizens of the country, and Brigham Young would have been assigned to that destiny which I hope to God awaits him at no distant day. But I care not to talk upon that subject.

Neither do I propose, at this time, to give my reasons for having been found, in the earlier part of this session, acting with a glorious minority upon this floor. In my own State I have been proverbial for acting with the majority, although I got gloriously thrashed at one time, but came out all right afterwards. It might be expected that I would have excuses to give for having been found acting with that minority upon that question at that particular time, but I hope to God the exigencies which induced the passage of that bill will not long exist. I allude, of course, to the bill which passed at the commencement of the session to authorize the issue of Treasury notes. I voted against the bill because I believed it violated the great constitutional Treasury system, which provides that all the payments of the Government shall be made in gold and silver, and I was not willing to convert this great Government of ours into a grand banking machine in disguise. But, sir, I do not propose to talk about that either. [Laughter.] I hope the time is not far distant when the necessity for any such measure will cease.

Mr. COBB. What are you going to talk about, then?

Mr. WARREN. I hate to keep the gentleman from Alabama in suspense, because I shall make a personal appeal to him before I have done. He is interested in the measures which I propose to advocate, and I think I have got him so that he cannot dodge the question. I propose, as I said, to talk about a matter in which my constituents are directly interested. I served, sir, during the Thirty-Third Congress, although I was repudiated during that time, and sent back to my constituents, again to be indorsed by them; and I served here long enough, then, to learn, that although gentlemen sometimes talk here of great national interests, they more frequently talk about home matters for home consumption; and, therefore, I propose to talk about home, about Arkansas. Some gentlemen, I apprehend, will be astonished, that a gentleman should rise in the Capitol of this great nation, and admit the fact that he is from Arkansas. [Laughter.] I am from Arkansas, sir; and I propose to tell the American Congress what Arkansas is, who she is; and I propose to assert her rights, and ask this Congress to enforce them by the passage of the bills which my colleague and myself have introduced; but, before I do so, I desire to make an appeal to two distinguished gentlemen upon this floor—the one from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] and the other from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER]—gentlemen for whom I entertain the highest personal and political regard, and who have justly acquired a national reputation as being the guardians of the Treasury of the nation.

I propose now to talk to those gentlemen, and to show them, if by possibility I can do so, that by the passage of the bills, to which I shall presently allude, the Treasury of this nation will not be impoverished, but will be greatly benefited. If I do that, I apprehend I shall succeed in obtaining the support of those gentlemen for those measures. I am particularly anxious to get their support, for the reason that one of them announced to us that he had been in Congress since the time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. I have not been here long, as you know; I came here by spells. [Laughter.] It is true that I was here in the Thirty-Third Congress; and it is true that before I made the acquaintance of my distinguished friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES],—though I was seeking to make his acquaintance—and that of the other gentlemen then upon this floor, the telegraph announced that my people at home had decided that another man should take my place. I submitted to it, as all good Democrats submit to the action of conventions, national, State and county. I went home and advocated the claims of the gentleman nominated in my stead; and he was sent here, and ably represented that district of the State of Arkansas, as he was well able to do. While home, I was called on to fight a battle, in which I engaged with more pleasure than in any other political combat of my life. I found a formidable foe, such as the Democracy of Arkansas had never before been called to combat. The American party in my district were claiming a majority of five thousand votes, which they had then upon their books. Though repudiated by my constituents, I took the field and proclaimed the doctrines of the Constitution. Ay, sir, I flung to the breeze that good old banner upon which was inscribed, "No proscription—equal rights and equal privileges;" and now you cannot find a Know Nothing in my district. [Laughter.] I am here again, only casually it may be, and I therefore appeal to those gentlemen who have been here so far back that we cannot recollect it, and who will be here in the future, possibly as long as they live, to come to my support, and to see that Arkansas gets a little good, at least as long as I am in Congress.

I propose now to speak of Arkansas. [Laughter.] Arkansas unfortunately, and I may use an Arkansas phrase, when she came into this Union, or about that time, "riz off the wrong foot." There was a set of men there who induced the State to engage in a system of banking which is calculated to ruin either a State or national Government, and to be a curse to any people. By this system she became involved in a debt of millions of dollars. It became necessary for her to appeal to the national Government, and this Government I admit has been generally beneficent to Arkansas. The General Government aided Arkansas, and as one good turn deserves another, I am going to ask the Government to be kind again. [Laughter.] Arkansas appealed to the Government for a loan of several hundred thousand dollars; now she has not paid a red cent of it, [great laughter,] although these liabilities were contracted by citizens, enterprising, honest, and good citizens, who have since left the State; yet Arkansas is populated by enterprising, honest, and virtuous citizens, who, if they cannot pay, will wind up their affairs, and not repudiate. It is for the reason that her citizens are honest, that they are upright, that they are enterprising and entitled to respect at the hands of this Union, that I am going to attempt to pass the measures about which I propose to speak.

They ought to pass in order that Arkansas may be lifted up to occupy that position which the God of nature designed she should occupy among her sister States.

We have heard a great deal said about the development of the resources of Arkansas. You have been told that northern Arkansas is a great agricultural country. You have been told that there are many minerals there. That is true, and for that reason, a few years ago, the American Congress were kind enough to make a munificent donation of land to aid in the construction of a railroad through that part of the State. But I want to tell you about another part of the State. I happen to come from the southern part of Arkansas, and I wish that gentlemen who know nothing about cotton planting or the management of African slaves would go there and see how we do things. The southern part of Arkansas is the best cotton-planting country within the limits of the United States. I speak advisedly, when I speak of southern Arkansas.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I thought the gentleman was going to talk about railroads.

Mr. WARREN. And so I am; you might have been sure of it. And I hope the gentleman will vote for the bills which I offer. Arkansas ought to have an appropriation. When I was in the Thirty-Third Congress, I proposed bills for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of the Mississippi, Ouachita, and Red River railroad, and a railroad from Napoleon to Little Rock, via Pine Bluff. I intend to give some reasons why these bills should pass. I will speak first of the road immediately in my district, and I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, its history. It is no new project, concocted and brought up in an hour. The bill about which I now speak was mooted in the Congress of the United States probably before I had the honor of a position upon this floor. In the Thirty-Third Congress I took occasion to introduce it. It was reported promptly from the Committee on Public Lands, and I had hoped the bill would pass. Other States had obtained grants of the public lands for railroad purposes, and I hoped that that bill would pass, but it slept among the unfinished business of the House. My successor at the next Congress introduced the same bill, and it shared the same fate. I have again introduced it at this session, and my colleague has introduced a similar bill to the one he introduced in the Thirty-Third Congress, and which shared the same fate as mine.

I want to talk of these bills, sir; not to show that they will benefit Arkansas so much. It is true that these roads will benefit Arkansas; but it is also true that they will benefit the Government, by granting us the lands which we ask for to aid in the construction of these roads. Let me lay down a proposition, which I challenge those who oppose the bills to controvert. I say that ninety-nine out of every one hundred acres along the line and within the limits prescribed in my bill, and belonging to the Government, that ever can or will be sold, have been entered, unless the road is completed. If the road be built what will be the result? Every foot of land that is now owned by the Government there will be taken up, and taken up speedily; and not only taken up and entered, but taken up and entered at the advanced price proposed by the bill. I apprehend that if I can convince the gentleman from Tennessee that this proposition is true he will certainly vote for the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me, I will make one remark just here. I do not wish this Government to speculate in lands, nor do I wish this Government to realize large profits from the sale of the public lands. I desire that it shall dispose of its lands in limited parcels to those who wish to cultivate them, and if for a price at all, at the lowest possible price which will indemnify the Government in the acquisition of the lands, and the perfection of title to settlers. And, sir, I now say to him, if my wish could prevail in regard to the public lands of this Government, the United States would never part with another quarter section except to an actual settler, and that at a very low price. Not one cent of profit would I ever ask of the cultivator of the soil for the land purchased of the Government. Sir, your wild lands are worth nothing until they are made valuable by the toil and sweat of the cultivator. It is his labor that gives any higher value to your lands, and I would so dispose of them that the cultivator should reap the entire benefit of that enhanced value. And no corporation should ever reap the benefit of the bounties of this Government.

Mr. WARREN. I apprehend that the best policy I could pursue would be to incorporate the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee into my own. We entertain pretty nearly the same views, only we have a different way of expressing them. [Laughter.] I am very much opposed to, and would oppose as strongly as any gentleman upon this floor, this Government entering into speculation with her land or anything else. I do not believe the Government should be converted into a speculating machine. I demonstrated my opinion upon that subject at an early period of this session; but, sir, in the language of the gentleman from Tennessee, I think the Government, when she owns public lands, ought to put them in a position to be settled by the honest people of the country. That is what I want. As the lands are now situated along the line of the contemplated railroads in Arkansas, it is improbable, if not utterly impossible that they ever will be settled. But let the gentleman from Tennessee come to my relief in this behalf; let us pass these railroad bills, and what will be the result?

Why, sir, the Government will have opened a field to which her citizens may emigrate. Arkansas is called a wild country. It is true, there are some uncultivated lands in that country; and yet, some of the best land within the limit of this Government is to be found in the southern district of the State of Arkansas—land capable of raising from one to three bales of cotton per acre. But they are unsettled. Why? Because the Government will not speculate in lands? No, sir. It is because the Government, while just to other portions of Arkansas—while just to Iowa, Illinois, and other States—and to the gentleman's own State, has withheld an appropriation giving them the means of carrying on what they, by virtue of their labor, might produce. That is the truth about it. That is one of the reasons why I thus early desire to call the attention of the members of this Congress to the bills which have been introduced by my colleague and myself.

Now, sir, I stated that Arkansas was involved in heavy liabilities. I stated that Arkansas was indebted to this Government; and, sir, had I been a member of Congress at that time, had I then been connected with this Government, and had the power to prevent it, neither Arkansas nor any other State of this Union would have been at all indebted to this Government. It is bad policy to allow the States to become indebted to the Union. But so it is. Arkansas, by virtue of an unfortunate, though honestly intended, legislation in her infancy, is involved in heavy liabilities. What shall we do? Do we ask the Government to step in and pay the debt of Arkansas? Not at all. We want the Government to act towards Arkansas as she has acted towards other portions of the country. We want the Government, if she can without loss, if she can by profit at the same time, assist Arkansas in developing her resources. What will be the result of the passage of the bills to which I have alluded?

I have said that this road passes through the best cotton-planting district in the country, and yet thousands of acres of that land are uncultivated because we have no means of getting the cotton to market. What will be the result? Let me tell you that by virtue of the enterprise and industry of the people of south Arkansas, those two roads are already partially graded, the one, the Mississippi, Ouachita, and Red River railroad, ninety miles, and the other, the one from Napoleon to Little Rock, by the way of Pine Bluff, is graded almost throughout its whole length. Now make the grant, and we can buy the iron and astonish the natives by the scream of the whistle and the snort of the iron horse. The result will be that all this fine land, about which I have spoken, will be reduced to cultivation. The result will be that all the best citizens of the old States of South Carolina, of Virginia, of Georgia, and all those States where slave labor is not now profitable, will flock to Arkansas; her revenue will be increased, and she will be enabled by honest labor to pay her debts.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of another distinguished gentleman from Alabama, to the proposition which I have been attempting to discuss. I allude to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. Cobb.] I appeal to him because this is a matter of vital interest to the State of Arkansas. This bill must pass. It is a good State, if you try it. There is a bold, hospitable, generous, clever, and enterprising population throughout the State, and we want to invite there more of the same class. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Alabama, now the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands; and I say to that gentleman, remember how I fought—I had almost said, bled and died—during the Thirty-Third Congress, in order that the Alabama land grant might be reported and passed, if it could be done. It was then reported, and I apprehend that it has since passed. "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise." I fought for you, to get your bill reported to the House. If it did not pass it was not my fault. I ask you now to report this bill back, and I promise this House that I will, when it comes up, correctly inform them of the length of the roads, the character of the country, and all about it, and I hope sufficiently so to secure the passage of the bill. I will not detain the House longer.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. STANTON. With the consent of the gentleman from Iowa, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. FLORENCE. There are a number of gentlemen who desire to speak to-night, and I move that the committee take a recess until seven o'clock this evening, with the understanding that no business shall be transacted. My colleague and others have been trying to get the floor to speak. Is that motion in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The question is upon the motion to rise.

Mr. FLORENCE. Can I amend the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. You cannot.

The question was put, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to call the attention of the committee to some of the points made in the argument of the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] in reference to the repeal or modification of the neutrality law. Two points in his argument have not yet been replied to, and I will briefly refer to them before I go into the main question before the committee—that relative to the Americanizing of Central America. I refer first to the point made by the gentleman from Mississippi, to the effect that the neutrality laws of the country interfered with the manufacturing interests of our country, and that, therefore—if I understood his argument—these laws were to be repealed. I have looked over the neutrality law of 1818, and I find that the third section is the only one that the gentleman could have had reference to. That section provides:

"That if any person shall, within the limits of the United States, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, and arming, of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district or people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or State" * * * "every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than ten thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than three years."

Now I submit to the gentleman that the fitting out and arming of a vessel means, of course, the preparation of a vessel of war, and has not the construction which he would put upon it, and which would affect our ship-building and other manufacturing interests. I also insist that, although the law does prohibit the fitting out and arming of a vessel in any of our ports against a nation with which we are at peace, it does not preclude the right of our citizens to construct ships of war, to manufacture arms, or otherwise to carry on their usual avocations. In case of war Colt may sell to one or both of the belligerent

Powers his revolvers. Sharpe may manufacture and sell his rifles; and our friends in Massachusetts and elsewhere, who are engaged in the construction of ships, may build vessels for them. I see, therefore, no reason on this ground why the neutrality law should be repealed. Our artisans are free to manufacture and sell; and the only risk or drawback they would encounter would be the danger of such articles being taken in transit as contraband of war.

The other point taken by the gentleman from Mississippi, and not replied to, is, that our people sympathize with other nations in their efforts to secure liberty; and they should participate to the fullest extent in efforts made to secure their political rights; that wherever a people is engaged in asserting that right this feeling manifests itself among our citizens; and the gentleman says that this sympathy ought to have full, unlimited scope. I would be the last person to wish to destroy or impair such a sympathy among our citizens. It is part and parcel of our education. We were taught it in our cradles. It was on this continent that the great rights of man were first inculcated. Here it was that the great principles of personal, social, and civil liberty were first understood, and enunciated to the world. It was on this continent that the principle was established that the sovereign power rested in the people, and not in the prince. It was here that this great principle was first established, and here, I trust, it will be fostered and maintained.

Now, although I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that this sympathy is worthy of being fostered and cherished, yet, at the same time, like all other principles, it needs the restraint of law. Have we not had evidence of this truth from the earliest history of the country? Have we not had evidence that this sympathy which the gentleman speaks of needs restraint? The very argument of the gentleman seems to me, therefore, to be in favor of a continuation of the neutrality law which he desires to have repealed. It was that disposition of our people—to go and endanger their own lives, and to compromise the peace and safety of this country—that induced and gave rise to the neutrality law.

Mr. QUITMAN. I desire to state distinctly to the committee and to the gentleman from Iowa, in answer to many arguments that have been advanced, that I do not seek the repeal of all the sections of the neutrality law. My bill, which gentlemen refused to have read, does not contemplate the repeal of any sections of the neutrality law but those which I believe are not in accordance with the constitutional powers of the Government. It seems to be a common mistake on this floor, that I seek by my bill to repeal the sixth section of the law forbidding military enterprises or expeditions from departing from our shores. Sir, there is no such proposition in my bill. I merely seek to have the matter so plainly laid down as to place its meaning beyond the reach of doubt; and in that explanation I hold that the enterprise must be a military one, or else it is not punishable by our laws. Another feature of the section is, that the expedition must be intended to depart from one of our own ports and not from a foreign port.

I beg pardon for interrupting the gentleman, but as I do not intend to speak again on this subject on the matter of reference, I desire that I may not be misunderstood. I seek only to repeal those features of the law which I regard as unconstitutional and as tending unnecessarily to trammel American enterprise, American industry, and American progress on this continent. I have not sought to repeal that feature which prevents military organizations from being got up in the United States, but simply to modify it and place it beyond doubt, so that neither the judges of the land, nor the President, nor the executive power of the land, nor Congress, should remain uncertain as to what the meaning of the law is.

Mr. CURTIS. I am glad the gentleman from Mississippi has defined his position, and I am glad to have an opportunity of enabling him to do so. I would be willing myself to see such a modification in the neutrality laws as to define more distinctly the crimes specified in that section of which he speaks, because, as the gentleman states, all the provisions of a criminal law should be clearly defined, so that a man may know how far he may go, and how far he may not go. I believe that a man has the right to expatriate himself if he chooses.

I believe that men may go to foreign countries; may expatriate themselves singly, or in companies of two, three, or more; but, at the same time, if such movements become general, and the parties are associated together for purposes of foreign aggression, then individual acts, being aggregated and applied, should be regarded as an act of war; and such zeal would then find proper restraint in the application of this sixth section of the act of 1818. I believe the provisions of that section, or similar provisions, should be still in force, because it is necessary for the maintenance of the great principle, that while we will maintain the institutions of our own country, at the same time we will keep on terms of peace and good will with all the other nations of the earth.

This sympathy, therefore, must be restrained by law, and it should, as the gentleman from Mississippi says, be clearly and distinctly defined. General Washington, without any specific law of the United States Government on the subject, found the power, under the law of nations, to restrain the sympathy which was manifested for such expeditions during his administration, and in so doing he gave offense to some of his friends in France, who were engaged in the French Revolution. His Farewell Address was especially earnest in cautioning us against all entangling alliances. When Jefferson came into power he very soon found the same necessity of restraining this sympathy, which had then partaken of a spirit of ambition. He found that it was necessary to control the sympathies of the people of this country in order to prevent them from going on an expedition against Mexico. I refer to the expedition of Aaron Burr, which was attempted to be carried with a high hand. It was restrained and broken up by Jefferson, long before the existence of the neutrality laws. He exercised this power to restrain American citizens in 1807, although the present neutrality act was not passed till 1818.

And so with regard to Monroe when he came to be President of the United States. These sympathies were manifested not in the ranks of our own citizens, but the consequences are of peculiar interest to the people of the sunny South, where the present excitement seems most prevalent.

Citizen Gregor McGregor, calling himself a brigadier general of Venezuela, New Granada, and commander-in-chief of the army of deliverance for the two Floridas, came to our southern shore with these and other high-sounding titles, and landed a force on Amelia Island at the mouth of the St. Mary's river. Although he asserted that he came commissioned by the Supreme Government of Mexico and South America, and although Amelia Island was in the dominion of Spain, President Monroe sent the army and navy and removed him, avowing the act in his message, and making sufficient explanation to Spain by avowing, that in taking possession of Amelia Island, it had not been his purpose to conquer any portion of Spanish soil.

The fictions of law and assumptions of power by McGregor, like those of General William Walker, were too transparent and frail to admit even of animadversion from any of the various Powers that might have espoused the cause of this lawless disturber of the peace of nations. Up to the present day it has not been regarded by Spain, or the States of Mexico and South America, that, in stripping McGregor of his flimsy assumptions, the President committed "a great outrage;" and his officers were not denounced or "discharged" for the part they took in the affair. The President assumed it as his act, the act of the country, and he excused it before the people of Spain by saying that he did not intend to usurp the power of Spain; that he did not intend to make a conquest of her soil, but to prevent this kind of marauding which an individual had set up against Spain, against the law of nations, and against the peace of the world. Such are some of the restraints on sympathy which transpired in this country previous to the enactment of 1818. More recently, and since the enactment of the law of 1818, we have frequently found occasion to exert the wholesome restraints of this neutrality law.

Do you not recollect the excitement that at one time prevailed on our northern frontier, when Canadian patriots assumed the powers and titles of commanding generals, and commenced marauding and battling for power, under the pretext of delivering the people of Canada from their vassalage to Great Britain?

Do you not recollect that this deluded zeal on our shore provoked an assault by British subjects on our domain? That a band of Canadians, at dead of night, came to our shore, and cut the steamer Caroline from her moorings; set her on fire, and sent her drifting, in flames, down the dreadful cataract of Niagara? And why was not ample and ready reparation granted by England, but because there was some excuse for the zeal of those who committed the act, who knew the Caroline had been engaged in transporting our citizens in their violations of British soil? Thus the peace of two great nations was not only periled, but almost destroyed, by the acts of a few men who claimed a right to use legal fictions, which would escape the penal statutes made to preserve our friendly relations.

To the honor of this country, the Canada difficulty was soon silenced by the energy of Government and discretion of General Scott; and thus the excesses of sympathy and patriotism found a wholesome check by the enforcement of this law, which now seems too stringent for some of the political schools of this eventful age.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Iowa will yield for that purpose, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. CURTIS. If it is the wish of the committee, I would as soon conclude what I have to say to-morrow.

Several MEMBERS. No, no; go on now.

Mr. COX. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 57, noes 30.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PHELPS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

On motion of Mr. PHILLIPS, the House then (at five minutes before four o'clock) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LIBRARY COMMITTEE.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. FESSENDEN to fill the vacancy in the Committee on the Library, occasioned by the withdrawal of Mr. HUNTER.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of Jeannette H. McCall, widow of James McCall, an officer in the revolutionary army, praying to be allowed a pension and bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CAMERON presented forty-five petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the location of the post office of that city, in the building lately occupied by the Bank of Pennsylvania; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KENNEDY presented the memorial of A. P. Robinson and others, composing the Washington Iron Pavement Company, praying Congress to authorize a contract with them for laying an iron pavement on Pennsylvania avenue; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the memorial of Alexander Randall, executor of Daniel Randall, praying for the payment of a balance of the commission claimed by him for collecting and disbursing money in behalf of the Government, during the late war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented a petition of citizens of Fayette county, Indiana, praying for the enactment of a law granting to each head of a family a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SLIDELL presented a petition of merchants of New Orleans, praying for an appropriation to build a steam-cutter for the protection of the revenue and commerce of that port; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of Aaron Van Camp and Virginus P. Chapin, praying for an indemnity for the illegal seizure and confiscation of their property at Apia, in the Navigator's Islands, by Jonathan S. Jenkins, United States consul to those islands, under the pretext of authority derived from his office of consul; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I present the petition of Edward N. Kent, of the city of New York, who states to the Senate that he is the inventor of a new and useful apparatus for separating gold from foreign substances, the exclusive right to use which has been secured to him by letters patent, according to the laws of the United States; that, by order of the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, this improvement has been introduced into, and is used, and is now in successful operation for washing sweep at the United States Mint in Philadelphia, the United States Assay Office at New York, and the United States branch mints at New Orleans and San Francisco.

He states, too, the very pleasant fact that there is a saving to the Government in the mints, so far as heard from, annually of $7,000 by the use of this invention, exclusive of the branch mint at San Francisco; that the savings would amount, so far as ascertained, to $120,400 in fourteen years, the term of his patent, and including the mint at San Francisco, the whole saving to the United States would be $240,800; and what is unusual in these cases, he proves these facts, so far as they are capable of proof, by the testimony of the officers of all the mints and assay offices of the United States. He submits to Congress a prayer that they will make him a just compensation for the use of his invention, which he estimates at the moderate sum of $20,000. I commend his application with all my heart to the attention of the proper committee, which I suppose to be the Committee on Finance. I move to refer the petition to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad Company, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred, on the 18th of December, a bill from the Court of Claims, for the relief of James Beatty's personal representative, with the report of the court in favor of the claim, reported the bill (S. No. 57) without amendment; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the petition of James G. Benton, the petition of E. B. Babbitt, and the petition of James Longstreet, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 59) for the relief of James G. Benton, E. B. Babbitt, and James Longstreet, of the United States Army. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Bronson, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 3) to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments in certain cases, reported it without amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 58) to authorize and direct the settlement of the accounts of Ross Wilkins, James Witherell, and Solomon Sibley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMMODORE PAULDING.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BROWN subsequently rose and said: The Senator from Wisconsin, this morning, laid upon the table a joint resolution proposing to present a medal, in the name of Congress, to Commodore Paulding for his late extraordinary exploit in Central America. I have looked over the resolution, and feeling that it will require some amendment before it can receive my vote, or, I hope, the vote of a majority of either House of Congress, I have drawn up an amendment which I propose to offer whenever the joint resolution shall be called up. My amendment is to strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert—

That Congress has heard with surprise of the arrest of William Walker and about one hundred and fifty other persons, at Punta Arenas, in Nicaragua, by Hiram Paulding, commanding the United States naval squadron, on the 8th day of December, 1857; and seeing that said act was in violation of the territorial sovereignty of a friendly Power, and not sanctioned by any existing law, Congress disavows it; and being officially notified that the said Paulding acted without instructions from the President, or the Secretary of the Navy, Congress expresses its condemnation of his conduct in this regard.

Mr. SEWARD. Will not the honorable Senator from Mississippi move that his amendment be printed?

Mr. BROWN. The joint resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin was not ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I move that both be printed. This is the first notice I have had of either.

Mr. BROWN. Very well.

The motion to print was agreed to.

NAVAL COURTS OF INQUIRY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 3) to extend and define the authority of the President under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,' in respect to dropped and retired naval officers; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Mason to reconsider the vote by which the Senate adopted the following amendment of Mr. HUNTER:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to allow the increase of the number of officers in the active-service list, as now authorized by law.

Mr. MASON. I made the motion to reconsider, as I stated yesterday, at the instance of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] and not being entirely satisfied in my own mind of the entire propriety of the vote I had given in the affirmative. Upon subsequent reflection, although I confess with a great deal of reluctance, I am prepared to change that vote. My reason for supporting the amendment originally was that it prevented any increase of the number of officers so as to exceed that provided by existing laws.

We are all aware that by the law of 1857, which made provision for these courts of inquiry, it was the opinion of the Senate that, in order to give effect to the policy of the Senate in doing full justice to officers who had been deranged and placed upon the retired list by the board of fifteen, and who, upon proper judicial inquiry, should be found to have been improperly dealt with, in order to enable them to place those officers where they stood before they had been thus deranged, we should enlarge the number in the respective ranks to which those officers belonged—a policy to which I was opposed at the time. I saw no necessity, so far as the public service was concerned, for increasing the number of officers; but yet it was very manifest that to such an extent had the naval service been deranged by the action of the board of fifteen, that the only mode then left of doing justice to those officers, was temporarily to enlarge the number.

The joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Mississippi was intended to authorize the President at his discretion to provide for a class of officers who had not been restored by the courts of inquiry—a policy in which I concurred. I believe the President already possesses the power; but we have been legislating very widely, I think, and unfortunately trenching so far on the executive authority as to assume, by implication at least, on the part of Congress, that it was necessary for Congress to supply this power. I am not, however, at all satisfied, if it be a correct policy to pass the joint resolution proposed by the honorable Senator from Mississippi that this amendment will not, in fact, destroy its operation; and reluctant as I have been, and still am, to go into this temporary policy of increasing the number of officers for the purpose of repairing the mischief already done, I do not see any escape from it. I moved the reconsideration without having fully considered the subject; on fuller consideration, I am prepared to change my vote.

Mr. STUART. I must say, sir, that I regret this proceeding. I regret it in several respects. In the first place, the question was fully discussed in the Senate, and a proceeding was had which is unusual. After the vote had been taken upon yeas and nays in the Committee of the Whole, the same vote was demanded in the Senate. There seemed to be, I thought, a tenacity that was unusual. After the Senate had thus expressed its opinion twice, deliberately and advisedly, now to be called upon to reconsider, and express it again, looks a little like a tendency toward a mere caucus—something of that sort which is informal and not of the legislative consequence which should pertain to the action of either House of Congress.

There is a remarkable fact developed in the course of this debate, which ought to weigh, and in my judgment, weigh conclusively, with the Senate. We were told by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SLIDELL,] that not a case which had been passed upon by these courts of inquiry had received the examination of either the Secretary of the Navy or the President of the United States—that those officers had taken the action of the courts of inquiry without any investigation at all. It was said by myself and others, and I think said with propriety, that the first law which organized the board of fifteen was a good law in itself; and that if it had been carried out properly by the executive department, upon whom the duty devolved, there could have been no such ground of complaint as was urged. That law required that the approval of the Secretary of the Navy and of the President should be given to the action of the board before it became final; and the evident intention of that law was, that those officers should be satisfied of the propriety of the action of the board; but it was said that was never done. It was affirmed that in that instance there was no ground upon which it could be done; that no record was kept by the board; and consequently, that neither the Secretary nor the President had anything to inspect. Then they ought not to have approved it. An approval does not mean the action of a mere automaton—a mere machine. It is the exercise of judgment and discretion. That, it will be recollected, was the strong ground of complaint which was urged here by Senators, and I think was the strongest reason why any amended law ever prevailed in the Senate.

What now, sir? An amended law was passed authorizing the organization of courts of inquiry, on the request of any officer, the action of those courts again to have the approval of the Secretary of the Navy and of the President. We are now told that it has not had it. I ask what is the object of any further legislation on this subject, if our former legislation has not been carried out? It requires the action of the executive department. You can have no law which can be supervised by Congress itself with any propriety or accuracy.

The action of the courts was to be supervised and approved by the executive department of the country; but it has not been done. What is the present proposition? It is to amend still further this law; and it is assigned as a reason that the President, approving the action of a court refusing to change the position of an officer, may still be at liberty to change that officer himself, on his own volition, if he thinks the action of the court has not been right. If I could be told, by any gentleman who is advised, that the President is thus examining these cases, there might be some ground for the amendment of the law; but we are told that he is not thus examining them; that he has not the time to do so; and I presume it is true. I presume, considering the mass of cases which have been examined by the courts of inquiry, and the great extent of the testimony, he has not the time, and cannot do it.

Then, what is to be the effect of this amendment of the law? Why, sir, to simply change the point of attack; to take it away from the Senate and from the House of Representatives, from Congress, and turn the whole power of it on the President. What probability is there that the President can possibly, by the exercise of all the power he possesses, do justice to individuals and do justice to the country? I have never been satisfied, I confess to you most frankly, that sympathy for an individual ought to prevail in all cases against the public interests. There is not a member of this body, I presume, who has not all the sympathy of which the human heart ought to be susceptible. It is not feeling alone, however, which ought to govern the Senate in passing upon public questions. Judgment and propriety of action are equally important.

Then I ask, on the facts as they are stated to the Senate, what is the prospect of improvement. I confess I do not see it. I speak now of improvement in regard to individual cases. I do not see how it is in the power of the President to carry out this law by a careful and critical examination of all the cases that are presented, and say in his judgment what ought to be done. We are told he has found himself utterly unable to do it. Then we are to look at the effect; and that was what induced me to vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER.] Are we in possession of any facts this day, as a senatorial body, that ought to induce us to add to the number of active officers in the Navy for the purpose of doing individual justice? I have not heard any such statement in this body. I have heard Senators say, as I heard it sessions ago, that they were willing to do almost anything that was honorable to protect the character of a man. I think that is a feeling which pervades the whole body. I am very slow to believe that there is a Senator here who is not willing and desirous to do whatever is right and proper to protect the character of an individual, either in the Navy or out of it. But I ask again, is the Senate in possession of such facts—have they been brought to us here by the report of our committee, or in any other mode to arrest our attention—showing that severe hardships do exist in consequence of the courts of inquiry, which ought to induce us to add to the active list of the Navy by passing this joint resolution? I have not heard them.

What may have been said to Senators individually out of session, I know not. I know that I have been somewhat belabored myself, and I presume I have had no more than my share of it; but I confess to you, sir, that I have heard nothing from any individual complainant, or from all of those who have spoken to me on the subject, which presented such a case as ought to induce Congress thus to enlarge the active list of the Navy.

It was said by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] who moved the reconsideration, that the effect of the amendment is to render the joint resolution nugatory. That is not entirely true in point of fact. It simply prevents the increase of the active list of the Navy. As the Senate passed the joint resolution, it would be competent for the President, as often as vacancies occurred, to fill them out of such cases as it refers to, keeping, however, the number upon the active list the same as now authorized by law. It does not, therefore, render the resolution entirely nugatory, but simply prevents the increase of officers upon the active list. If there have been, or if there are existing, some cases which demand this species of action on the part of the President, I can see no danger on account of the delay which may thus be interposed. It is perfectly clear that the President must necessarily take much time in order to satisfy himself where those cases are, and which they are. During that time, vacancies may occur; at all events the proper cases for his action may be ascertained, and he may place his opinions upon record so that they shall appear to his successor, whoever he may be, and he may examine them—the law is permanent—and whenever a vacancy occurs in the active service, then the effect of the law will remain.

Now, Mr. President, it does seem to me as if there was an effort to enlist the mere sympathy of Congress against its better and maturer judgment. Feeling that, and, as I said, having heard nothing from reports of committees, or otherwise, to satisfy me of the imperious necessity of this action, I have not been able to bring myself to the conclusion that I ought to vote for it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I have no disposition to make any remarks on this subject. I know the embarrassment under which I should labor in doing so; I am laboring under severe hoarseness; but it seems to me that the Senator from Michigan has misapprehended the object of this resolution, and misconceived the effect it will have, if the course which those who favor a reconsideration have in view be adopted. If I understood one remark which he made, he appears to believe that it would operate in such a way as to defeat the more mature judgment that has been expressed in relation to these men. Do I understand the Senator aright?

Mr. STUART. I stated that it seemed to me to be an effort to enlist the sympathy, instead of the maturer judgment, of the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. If it is the design of others, it has never been mine, as one of the members of this body, to enlist the sympathy of the Senate, or to endeavor to excite its indignation. I think the injustice done by the retiring board was such as to appeal to the national sympathy, and to excite the most indignant feeling for the wrongs inflicted by that board on individuals; and the partiality, the pandering to the inducements of ambition, the selfishness, which were palpable, ought to have appealed to the whole nation. But, sir, I desire nothing but the deliberate judgment of the Senate to be exercised on this occasion; nor would I, if I were capable, invoke any other agent than the mature judgment of the Senate. Why, sir, we are told that the President has it not in his power to examine into these cases. It is said that after the most elaborate and searching examination by the courts, the result has been reported to the President, and, if we believe the newspapers, he has lent his sanction to it, and sent that sanction to the Senate for their action in most of the cases presented to the courts.

But, sir, there may be cases where prejudice, where perjury, where contrivances of a mischievous character have been employed to prejudice individuals; and, in such extraordinary instances, when an appeal is made to the Executive, he ought to have an opportunity of examining the matter. This resolution will not impose on him the necessity of examining all the records in all the cases; but only in such cases as are of peculiar hardship. We ask that the Executive may, when he has leisure, be allowed to examine thoroughly, and see upon what evidence these officers have been degraded, or upon what testimony justice has been denied to them. Sir, it only gives the President the privilege of examining, in extraordinary cases, and making restorations of officers to the situations from which they were wrongfully driven. That is the object of the joint resolution, if I understand it. Nothing else is sought to be attained in a reversal of the former vote of the Senate. It is not disrespectful to the body to propose that it should reconsider its action, if that action has been premature, or if the subject has not been fairly presented, or if its action was taken hastily, as is the case with many matters in this body, when measures are presented by the chairman of a committee—they are taken upon faith.

I shall not now carefully animadvert upon the circumstances attending this measure from its inception to its terrific consummation, because I have an occasion in reserve when I will lay open to the public eye matters which, when examined, will invoke the indignation of the whole community; but this is not the occasion on which to do it. The joint resolution merely proposes to extend to the Executive the right to restore officers who have been wrongfully driven from the service, where the President is satisfied that great wrong and injustice have been done to them, and that their restoration will be an act of justice and a reward of merit. That is all it contemplates. It is all that is desired by its friends—that justice should be awarded to such as have suffered injustice, and that right should be done where wrong has been inflicted. There is no other object, so far as I am interested in this matter, than to have sheer justice accorded to individuals in cases where the Executive is satisfied that wrong has been committed. It is the highest duty of the national representatives, in their collective wisdom, to make reparation to individuals who have been wronged. If an insult were offered to the national flag, the nation would then rise in its majesty; but, here, the complaints of an individual who has been stricken down unjustly while in the service of his country, are to be disregarded because of his want of friends, of patronage, or of influential connections! No matter how audibly the appeal may be made in behalf of justice, it is not regarded, because he can be thrown aside unheeded. Influence, power, patronage, contrivance, corruption, and perjury, have all been invoked for his destruction; and yet there is no remedy for the wrong. Are we to submit to such wrongs when it is only necessary to say that the Executive shall have the right, where he is satisfied that injustice has been done, to make reparation and to restore the individual to a position which he has merited, either by long service or by gallant deeds; or, perchance, purchased with his blood in the hour of peril?

Unless you adopt the motion to reconsider, and pass the resolution without the proviso of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER]—unless you accord this privilege to the President, all these wrongs may be inflicted upon individuals without the hope of redress; irreparable injury may be committed, affecting not only them but their families who are dependent on the pittance which they receive from the Government. I sincerely hope, sir, that Senators, considering the importance of this matter to individuals, to the national honor, and to the glory of its flag, will all vote to extend that justice which is asked. We simply propose that where the Executive is satisfied that wrong has been done, and that it is right to repair that wrong, he shall have the power to remedy it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I hoped when I attempted to explain this resolution on Monday, and to make my objections to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, that I had answered some of those points which have been again presented to-day. I stated then, as nearly as I can now recollect, what I am sure is the fact, that the amendment of the Senator from Virginia deprives those persons contemplated by the resolution of the whole of the remedy which it is proposed to give, for it must be apparent that the operation of this proviso is to leave, not only immediately, but for a long time to come, any one who shall receive the benefit of the resolution, upon the reserved list. I hardly supposed it to be necessary to argue to the Senate, after having so fully considered this whole question, that officers retired as disabled or incompetent to command were not afterwards in the line of promotion. The proposition is so self-evident, so startlingly true, that I was utterly at a loss when the Senator from Michigan took up the thread this morning as though it had never been broken.

Why, sir, we have been laboring to very little purpose indeed, if all this examination has resulted in discovering here and there men who were unfit to command, and placing them on a reserved list where they are to stand for promotion—not retired from active service, as was the contemplation of the law—but put aside for promotion. What will be the effect of it? Merely to provide by law that the officer shall hold the place which, if there had been no law, he would have held. An officer waiting orders on shore, applying to command a vessel, but receiving no command, is in the exact condition of an officer on the reserved list with leave pay, except that he has the right of promotion. He has the right to succeed to vacancies in a higher grade when they occur; but whilst on shore waiting orders on leave, or on furlough, he is in the exact condition in which gentlemen seem to contemplate an officer on the retired list. I am sure the very intelligent chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs would never have struggled from day to day, and week to week, to get a retired list, if that was all the effect of it.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator understood me as advocating that doctrine, he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. DAVIS. Do you not hold that position?

Mr. STUART. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS. I am glad I misunderstood the Senator, and I am happy to be corrected. Then I proceed to the next branch of the argument—that if officers of the Navy on the retired list are to be promoted at all, they should be promoted when vacancies occur. Why, sir, that is adding insult to injury. Are you to say that you are to put him on the reserved list, that you are to promote his subordinates over his head, and there to let him stand, though you admit the justice of his claim, until vacancies shall occur, in order that he may slip beneath those whom he formerly outranked? The man who would accept such promotion would not be fit to command in your service. I would not trust him with the honor of the country.

This must be done at the present time, and it must be done in the form of restoration; and in that way alone can you save the honorable pride of the service. To postpone it in order that he may succeed to a vacancy beneath some young gentleman whom he trained when a midshipman, would be to offer the highest indignity that any man worthy to wear the military uniform of his country could receive. Therefore I say the proviso of the Senator from Virginia takes from the resolution all that is valuable in it, saving here and there some individual cases where an officer has been dropped entirely from the Navy, and may come back to the furlough or the leave list, and there receive the poor pittance that the Government may be willing to dole out to him.

As I said on Monday, my sympathy was excited for these men—I plead guilty to the charge which the Senator from Michigan makes that I have sympathy; and I thought, as I listened to him, in his remarks this morning, that however his ears might have been belabored, his judgment was secure. I am not without sympathy, and I trust I shall never live long enough to be without it. I have not been harassed by the importunity of gentlemen who have suffered. I admit, sir, that when I have met those whom I believed to be worthy of better treatment, and deserving of the gratitude of the country, and seeing the pulsations of a heart crushed by a sense of injustice and ingratitude, I have felt wounded, and regretted that I had not the power to redress the wrong. But, sir, the propriety of the law in its beginning is a question which I think it is unnecessary now to discuss. I thought some provision which would place on an honorable list those officers who were no longer fit to command was desirable. I thought a list, which should contain those men who had been distinguished in their country's service, who, from wounds and from old age, had become unfitted for active service longer, and which should there leave them in comfort the balance of their days, was what the country owed, what the good of the country demanded, what the interests of the Navy absolutely required. As to the execution of the law, I do not concur with the Senator from Michigan that a great fault was committed in not examining a record which the law did not require to be made. I think it might have been as well to reject the whole action of the board, because there was not a record; but I cannot conceive how either the Secretary of the Navy or the President could have laid his finger on this or that case, and said this is approved and that is disapproved. It came to them in gross; it came to them without a record and without evidence. The only regret I have, is that they did not reject it in gross as it came, and require in each case a separate record.

Then came the remedial action of Congress. That remedial action provided for an inquiry and a record which had not been provided in the first instance. Under that remedial action you have agreed to increase the numerical strength of the different grades as far as men should be found fit for active service, who had been put on the reserved list. You suspend promotion until that excess has been absorbed. Now I only ask that where the court has not recommended restoration, but the record proves the individual to be worthy of restoration, the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—both of them having access to the record—shall put the individual on the footing on which he would have stood if the court had recommended his restoration. I say nothing against the courts, and I have no charge to make against them of a want of judgment, or want of integrity, or a want of interest in the Navy; but, sir, it is proceeding very far when such a court is at once invested with infallibility, and the President and Senate denied the power to revise their proceedings, except so far as it may be the hard measure of rejecting nominations. I think it much more probable that that court, having its sympathies with the constituent elements of the board, followed the error of the board, and failed to render justice to some individual against whom a prejudice might have been excited, than that the President, in reviewing the record, would commit the other error, and bring from the obscurity into which they had shrunk, unworthy officers of the Navy, and place them on the active list.

Then, sir, it has been stated that the President has examined none of these records, and it has been argued therefrom that he will examine none of them. Though I should not have said it otherwise, I deem it due to that high officer to say—and it is honorable to him when I say it—that before I presented the resolution to the Senate, I showed it to him, as involving labor on his part; and with the feelings of a man, and the sense of duty of an officer, he said he was willing to incur the labor and meet the responsibility which it would impose. He cannot, under the resolution, nominate, unless his action is based upon the facts contained in the record, and he must examine the case that he submits, under the authority conferred by the resolution. Again, the Senate have access to the record; the Committee on Naval Affairs will first sift it, and it will then come to the Senate for a further examination. I cannot see the danger of inflicting any great injury on any one by opening the door thus far. How many it will add to the grades I do not propose to inquire. I believe they will be very few. They will be added to the excess which has already been provided, and they will have to be absorbed before further promotion occurs; but it would be cruel in the last degree to ask them to stand aside until their subordinates, favorably reported on by the board, had been absorbed by the occurrence of vacancies, and then, and then only, to let them come in to take a place inferior to some one, whom, perhaps, they had instructed in the very first elements of his profession.

As to the change in the point of attack, of which the Senator from Michigan has spoken, I will only say that by the law, as it stands, the President has the power to revise, to approve, or to disapprove, the action of these courts, though, whilst you have conferred that authority on the President, you have stripped him of all remedial power. If he disapproves in a case which may be as clear as light, still he cannot nominate to the Senate, though it be palpably presented in the record evidence that that individual is worthy of such nomination.

I will say, further, that I think the law was wrong in allowing the board, or in recognizing in the court, power to drop any one from the list of the Navy who had attained the first grade. I hold that if an individual has served his country from the grade of midshipman up to that of a post captain—the highest grade in the Navy—nothing but a court-martial, with all the due forms of law, should strip him of his place. Whatever may be his incapacity to command, whatever may be his bad habits at the time, I say he cannot have reached that grade without rendering service to the country which entitles him to its gratitude. After many years exposed to battle and to storm, crushed by wounds, or by time spent honorably in the service of his country, it is a paltry meting out of a very hard measure of justice to turn him out upon the wide common of the world, there to call all eyes to look upon an age of ruin. Incapacitated for command, he ought to have been placed upon some honorable retired list, which would have given him at the same time a support, and have saved his feelings from the wounds which are inflicted by that species of inquisition which marks every man placed upon the list as having done some act which disgraced the uniform he wore—a moral inquisition which leaves the man who has been crushed by age and wounds received in battle, upon the same footing with him whose vices have rendered him unfit to command. For those vicious habits, for those irregularities, for those crimes, courts-martial were instituted; and to them resort should have been had, and not to a board which, if it intended more, never should have intended more than to ask, "where is he who has been worn out in the service, and for whom we shall provide some safe asylum, where he may rest in quiet during his declining years?" That was the whole scope and intent of that bill which provided a retired list for the Army; and I here take occasion to say, that if that bill had passed, no man should have been retired unless he was confronted with the board; unless he made the application; and unless, in every case, there had been a record of all the testimony.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, I think there is a misunderstanding among Senators as to the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. Its effect is to deprive a large class of the officers of the Navy of the United States of those legal securities and guarantees which have been regarded from the beginning of the Government, during the Revolution, and the war of 1812—indeed, in peace and in war, from the foundation of the Government—as essential to their protection. It deprives them of those legal securities which are now accorded to every person in the naval and military service of the United States except themselves. If that be true—and I think I can very readily show it to any one who will look at the matter for an instant—there ought to be some special reasons why this class of persons, now in the service, should be deprived of those legal guarantees now given to every officer inside of that service except themselves, and which have been accorded by the law from the foundation of the Government to this time.

The amendment of the Senator from Virginia defeats the operation of the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi to this extent: the resolution proposes that where the President disapproves of the finding of the court, on examination, and thinks an officer is entitled to be restored to the active list, he shall have the right of sending his name, with the record, to this body; and if they approve it, he shall be restored. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia says this shall not be done until vacancies happen, and shall not be done to the enlargement of the present active list of the service. Therefore, I say, it entirely defeats a security to which I will now advert. When this naval board was established, the President was required to approve its action; but, as you have just heard stated by the Senator from Mississippi, he was required to approve without any evidence before him on which to approve or disapprove. He had to approve or disapprove the whole, because there was no record of each particular case, and he could make no judgment. They were, therefore, effectually deprived in that case of this legal security, which has been given both to Army and Navy officers.

When this proceeding was scrutinized, and the opinion and calm judgment of the Senate and House of Representatives were brought to bear upon it, it was nearly unanimously condemned. To these officers was awarded an open trial, and the record there was subjected to the approval or disapproval of the President, but in such a mode as not only to take away this security, but to absolutely do the greatest injustice. I will state a case for the Senator from Michigan, who is the only person I have heard harp on sympathy. We have argued this subject—certainly I have—for eighteen months on the great question of constitutional rights, without reference to any man, or how he might be treated, in the Navy. Nobody, I believe, but those who have sought to defeat just and legitimate action on this subject, has talked of sympathy. They wish to get out an impression that those of us who are tempted to vindicate the laws, and to protect these great guarantees of individual rights, were operated on by sympathy for the officers. I happened to know very few of them when this proceeding took place; not half a dozen in the naval service. I was not on terms of personal intimacy with a human being among them, and I was on social terms with only three of them. But I saw a great principle of public right, of constitutional law, stricken down by a proceeding which I am happy to know has been condemned by the judgment of the country, as expressed through its representatives in both branches of Congress.

If the President disapproves the action of a court of inquiry in some cases, under the law of last year, he must do additional injury, or else he must approve the action against his judgment. I will take a case of which I happen to know, from looking at the records. A commander or captain in the Navy was, by the secret board, put on the furlough list. That implied personal fault. Upon an investigation of his case by an open tribunal, a court of inquiry, that sentence was disapproved; and it is recommended that he be placed on the leave-of-absence list—an honorable list—with full-leave pay, as though he were in active service, on leave of absence. The President may believe not only that the first finding was wrong, but that the measure of justice proposed by the court of inquiry is inadequate; that, instead of being placed on the leave-of-absence list, he ought to be put on the active-service list. It will not cost the Government a cent to put him on the active list, because, if he were ordered from the leave list into active service, he would get full pay; and, if he were not ordered into active service, though on the active list, he would only get leave-of-absence pay. If, in the case to which I refer, the President disapproves the finding of the court, the officer is put back on the furlough list; and yet the disapproval is because the President believes the measure of justice proposed to be inadequate. The court have found that the original sentence was unjust, and that the officer ought to be placed on the leave-of-absence roll, the most honorable of the retired list; the President may believe he ought to be placed on the active list, and it will not cost a cent to place him there; therefore the President must put his official approval to what he thinks is not a proper measure of justice, or a valuable officer is lost to the public service. Why should this be?

The law of last year gave the President a right to approve or disapprove the findings of these courts. And yet if he disapproves, the effect is to leave the officer remediless, to keep him under a sentence unjustly pronounced upon him by a secret tribunal. If every member of the Senate believes, on an examination of the record, that the court of inquiry acted from wrong information, from perjury, or any other bad motive, and the President thinks an officer against whom they have reported ought to be restored, he is remediless; whereas twelve hundred officers, his comrades in the active service, cannot be deprived of life, of commission, of pay, or be censured, or in any other manner injured, without the coöperation of a court of inquiry, or court-martial, and the President. These are the guards which the existing military laws of the United States throw around your officers, but these persons are deprived of them. Why should an individual on the leave-of-absence list be cut off from this guarantee? Take the gentleman at the head of your Navy. Suppose a court of inquiry had determined not to restore him to the active list, contrary to the evidence, and the President and Senate were satisfied that he ought to be restored: why should he who has stood on your quarter decks, in battle and in storm, for fifty years, be deprived of those rights which the laws of his country give to the humblest man who bears your commission in the military or naval service? The commission of a lieutenant in the Army or Navy cannot be taken from him except by the judgment of his peers, sanctioned by the commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; but men who have lost their places by the proceedings of a secret tribunal, the judgment of which is confirmed by a court of inquiry by a vote of two to one, are to be deprived of these rights, and are to be kept back, although the President and Senate may be unanimously for restoring them to their old places.

But, sir, the Senator from Virginia tells us that he does not wish to enlarge the active-service list. That point was settled at the last session. It was admitted by me; admitted by the whole Senate; admitted even by many of those gentlemen who were pressing forward others to fill these places, that the service was already too full; but the Senate and House of Representatives said, for the purpose of repairing wrong, for the purpose of restoring men to places from which they have been unjustly ejected—we will enlarge this list. That was the very principle of the act of last session—that, to the extent of doing justice to these men, the list should be enlarged. That I want carried out. The Senator from Mississippi proposes no new scheme, no novelty, for these men. We are not changing the settled policy of this Government, from sympathy. We are endeavoring to give to these officers the same protection which is accorded to others in the public service; no more, no less. I should like to know from my friend from Virginia on what principle one of these men is not entitled to that protection which the practice of the Government and the laws of the land have given to all other officers in the Army and the Navy? This protection is to-day enjoyed by those who have not suffered injustice; you only debar from it the victims of perfidious treachery.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, it was far from my intention to be drawn into this discussion; but really some arguments have been introduced this morning into the Senate that strike me with some surprise. The argument of the honorable Senator from Mississippi is, that the effect of the amendment, as it now stands upon his resolution, is to place an officer, if a vacancy happens, below those who were previously below him. Precisely the reverse of that is the effect of the Senator's resolution. If one of these officers is brought back into the active list by the effect of the resolution, he is to be brought back in precisely the position he occupied before. That is his resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. Without the amendment.

Mr. STUART. Does the amendment change it? Not at all; but it provides that you cannot bring him back to that position until there is a vacancy in that position.

Mr. DAVIS. I think I can state to the Senator the difference. There never will be a vacancy in that position, whilst navies float, or the earth stands, because every vacancy closes up as rapidly as water succeeds the dipping of a drop out of the ocean. He must come in at the foot, and when he comes in at the foot he comes with a commission of that date and cannot rank those who are senior to him.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator is right in that statement, then it must be equally true that either no man in that position will ever die, or else that, having died, the President will not discharge his duty under this law; because, according to this law, whenever a vacancy does happen in that grade, the President is, by the very terms of the resolution, authorized to fill it with one of these very men. There is no such thing as filling it up by operation of law. Here is the very resolution which the Senator himself has introduced intended to prevent it. There can be no misunderstanding the effect of this resolution. Without the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, the individual is brought back, if the action of the President and Senate be favorable, to precisely the position he occupied before; and the objection is, that thereby the active list is increased and unnecessarily increased. Therefore, in order to sustain the position occupied by him, the Senator from Mississippi assumes, against the effect of his resolution and against the effect of the duty of the President of the United States, that these individuals will come back in a lower grade.

But, sir, there is another and a more serious objection, which I indicated before, and which I was in hopes the Senator from Mississippi, or some other Senator, would remedy. I ask who are these individuals that have had injustice done to them now; and how many are there of them? It is said that it is not necessary to inquire. The Senator from Mississippi says he does not care to inquire. I do. Before I vote for a law which is to authorize the President of the United States to increase the active list at his pleasure, I want to know the instances, and how many there are, that require this extraordinary interposition of Congress. It was the very foundation of my objection that the Senate is called upon now to legislate, to remedy evils when there is no information as to what the evils are.

If there were any gentlemen who had presented their memorials here and had them referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, or to any other committee, and upon an investigation thus had, that committee had reported to the Senate that there were one, two, three, or a thousand cases where gross injustice had been done by these courts of inquiry, the Senate would then have a ground upon which to act; but now it is destitute of anything but an imaginary case. The Senator from Georgia has instanced the case of Commodore Stewart. I do not understand that he has been before these courts of inquiry, and therefore no injustice has been done to him by the courts of inquiry. It will be seen that the advocates of this measure have sought—I care not whether it is designed or not, but the effect of the argument is—to enlist the sympathies of the Senate to look after imaginary cases. I did not hear the precise remarks of the honorable Senator from Mississippi; but the only objection I made to his expression of his sympathy was that he did not stand alone, that he had no more sympathy than any other Senator, and I hope no less. That was my statement.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not understand the Senator as measuring my sympathy, because I had not said that I had any when he made his remark. I thought he was taking a broad sweep at creation generally, and me as a part of it.

Mr. STUART. The Senator has forgotten his remarks of Monday [Mr. DAVIS. Oh; you are after me for what I said on Monday] when he proclaimed himself, as I thought, the champion of the rights of man.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no; not at all. It is very flattering to me that the Senator should mistake me for a champion of the rights of man; but I certainly never so proclaimed myself.

Mr. STUART. Well, sir, there cannot be any ground of misunderstanding certainly between the honorable Senator and myself on this subject; but I did think, and I repeat, and beg pardon for repeating, that it was remarkable that the Senate should be called upon to pass a law, and having passed it, to reconsider it, and revise it, when we are not told of a single case requiring it. The resolution itself proceeds on the ground that there may be such cases. If they shall occur, if the President, in the course of his examination, shall find, or may have found, any such cases, then the resolution is to be operative.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator is going to vote with me, which I hope he is, from the course of his argument, I will ask him to permit me to state a case.

Mr. STUART. With pleasure.

Mr. DAVIS. I said the other day that I was very reluctant to go into the individual question of who was wronged. I said that, unless pressed to it, I would not mention any individual case. Being pressed, I am willing to meet the issue. I knew an officer, the son of as gallant a soldier as ever wore the uniform of the United States, and known by you, sir, [Mr. FITZPATRICK in the chair] as once the model soldier. After years of good conduct, he was sent to the coast of Africa as lieutenant of the Navy. The commanding officer of the vessel, on account of sickness in his family, was compelled to return home. He turned over the vessel, with confidence, to that lieutenant, and he commanded it with such skill and good judgment that the officer to whom he surrendered the vessel, complimented him on the condition of his ship and his crew. He appeared before this court and admitted that at an early period of his life he had been intemperate. It was proven that for six years his conduct had been entirely exemplary in that respect, and that his moral conduct had never been called in question. That officer has not been restored. He comes under the very category for which this resolution provides.

Then again, sir, it chanced that when I was in a different department of this Government, an officer in the Navy, a commander, having charge of a small vessel in Puget's sound at a time when the savages were laying waste the country along the coast, landed his command, and cooperated with the troops, and gallantly protected the citizens, drove back the savages, and in such a signal manner manifested his own gallantry and skill that I had to compliment him in a letter addressed to the Navy Department returning the thanks of the Army to the Navy for the service he had rendered. At that very moment this board here had his case under consideration; and at length it came out that he was dropped from the Navy. There is one, gallantly struggling with a savage foe in Puget's sound; there is another, gallantly commanding a vessel on the coast of Africa—both of them on duty and performing their duty well—and they are struck down by a board sitting in secret, on account of ancient transactions of these men. Is that enough? There are two cases.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FITZPATRICK in the chair.) The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. When he gets through I wish to speak.

Mr. STUART. I will say to the honorable Senator that I do not claim any particular monopoly of the floor. I only yielded it to give the honorable Senator from Mississippi an opportunity to make his statement, and it was with no very great degree of pleasure that I occupied it at all. The cases to which the honorable Senator from Mississippi has referred, furnish us two instances, in his opinion, and I do not wish to question the correctness of his opinion.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not want my opinion taken. I want the record these gentlemen have made, after the President has examined it, to come before the Senate, and I want the Senate to decide on the recorded facts.

Mr. STUART. What I was urging to the Senate was, that no case had been presented to the Senate through its legitimate organs, the committees; that there was this remarkable fact, that the Senate was about to pass a law to remedy evils of the existence of which we had no evidence, through our own organs.

Now, sir, I have a word to say on the subject as presented by the honorable Senator from Mississippi. I never yet knew a case where an individual, who, before any judicial tribunal, had been defeated, was satisfied that justice had been done him. But what is the fact here, upon the Senator's argument? He complains, taking his view of this question, and with which I have stated my disagreement, that an individual may find himself superseded, if this amendment prevails, by another individual whom he has ranked in former days. But suppose this law prevails, what then is the condition? An officer, against whom there has never been a single breath of suspicion, finds himself displaced or prevented in promotion by an officer who has been decided against by this secret board, as it is termed, and decided against by a court of inquiry also. That is his position. So there are two sides to this question—a man twice condemned is made to rank a man who has never been suspected at all. Is that right? Is that justice? I think not; and I think it will be hardly considered to be justice by the mature reflection and deliberation of Congress. I ask—and I ask it with as much respect for the opinions and action of the President, I hope, as any other individual—by what rule of propriety is Congress now going to proceed in the enactment of laws assuming that the courts of inquiry, and the board of fifteen, have been wrong, and that the opinion of the President is to correct it?

I must here deny, upon the principles governing humanity, that there was an inclination on the part of these courts of inquiry improperly to reject the applicant. I appeal to the cases which have been tried. Take the list, and see how many have been acted upon favorably by these very courts. Although, like the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS] my acquaintance personally with the officers of the Navy is very small, I know at least two cases in which, in my humble judgment, that court has acted improperly, and I believe the Senate will never confirm that action. I know one case, a very strong one, where a man was got into the Navy by political influence alone without any service and without any merit.

I dislike as much as the Senator to refer to any particular case, but I ask upon what basis is legislation ever to proceed if the action of constituted courts is to be set aside. Did anybody ever hear of a case in a civil or a criminal tribunal, acting upon individuals in civil life, where a portion of the community thought the judgment of the court and jury was improper; and has the Legislature of the State been called upon, or Congress been called upon to pass a law giving to the President, or anybody else, the power to revise and correct it? He has the right to pardon, and that alone.

One word in regard to one other subject and I have done. The Senator from Mississippi says he thinks the former Secretary of the Navy and the President were right in approving the report of the board of fifteen in a mass, without any record and without any reason. I had occasion to state at the last Congress, and I repeat now, that I think they were wrong. I submit, again, that when Congress, in a law, says that the action of a board is to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy and the President, it is an affirmative act; it is an act, if you please, of judicial discretion; it means no more nor less than that they are to be satisfied of its correctness. That is approval. Approval means what? That it meets your judgment—not a mere form—not, as I before said, as a mere machine, as a matter of course to sign any paper that is presented. I suggested that as a reason why it is worse than useless for Congress to be passing laws requiring the approval of the Secretary of the Navy and President of the United States, if the subject is not to receive their examination. Strike it out of the law; never require an officer to make an approval that he has not the ability to make, by a careful examination of the case. If an approval means anything in a law, it is, that he must say “my judgment sanctions it.” That is an approval. How do we stand here, now, upon this proposition? Simply that there are cases which the courts of inquiry have revised, carefully considered with evidence before them, and determined; and it is proposed to give the President the power notwithstanding, to nominate that individual to a position in the active service which shall interfere with the position now held by an officer against whom no complaint has ever been made at all.

Mr. President, it seems to me that there are not only two sides to this question, but that the side which I present calls imperatively upon Congress to maintain the public interests and at the same time maintain the rights of individuals. I confess my inability to discover by what rule of argument it can be assumed that a man who has been twice tried and each time condemned, is prima facie not guilty. That is the assumption—a man twice tried and twice condemned is prima facie not guilty, and therefore Congress, upon its own volition, is to pass a law for his relief! That does not meet my judgment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I had hoped never to be under the necessity of speaking on this subject again. I confess I am tired of it, and I confess the Senate are tired of hearing it; but one or two things have fallen in the course of this debate to which I wish to call attention, one of which is in reference to the gallant old man who stands at the head of the Navy. It is my fortune to have a slight acquaintance with him, and to be on kind personal relations with him. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. CARRITTENDEN] says he does not stand at the head of the Navy; but he did. He does stand at the head of the Navy in the estimation of everybody who appreciates what belongs to the Navy—its honor and its renown. This court—no, sir, I will not call it a court; God forgive me if I ever call that old board a court, [laughter]—these fifteen men who sat in secret conclave have not disgraced him, and they cannot do it; and put fifteen more on top of them and they cannot do it. I know that that old man feels, and feels deeply, in his heart of hearts, that the measure of justice which his country has meted out to him has been disgraced.

The honorable Senator from Michigan says that, because he has not come cap in hand, praying to these junior gentlemen to restore him to that high place which he occupies in the affections and the hearts of the American people, and gone down on his knees begging for a boon from the men whom he has a right to command, he does not feel injured and is not injured. Sir, he is injured; and every man who appreciates the honor and renown that belongs to that gallant old man is injured too, and will be injured just exactly as long as he or his fame rests under this cloud which these fifteen men have endeavored to draw between him and the American people.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi has mentioned one or two cases; and I am a little surprised that, knowing as much as he did, he did mention them. One was a gallant act performed in Puget sound, and the other on the coast of Africa. Does he not know that those places are a great way off, and that the saloons and assembly rooms of Washington are a great deal nearer? Does he not know that the shore duty these gentlemen have performed is not on Puget sound, or on the coast of Africa? I could repeat more cases and make the list longer, and show him and tell him of men who were doing all that belonged to sailors and patriots and brave and honorable men, but they were doing it a great way off; they had not been to an assembly or ball here for years; they have not been doing what I believe is called bureau duty, [laughter;] I believe that is what they call it here in Washington; and, therefore—no, I will not say therefore they have been dropped, but I will say they have been doing it, and they have been dropped. I will let those put in the “therefore” who choose to do so.

Again, sir, I believe the honorable Senator from Michigan is a lawyer. I know he is, and a good lawyer, an eminent lawyer, [Mr. STUART. Thank you;] and yet he talks of the Star Chamber—the secret conclave that undertook to crowd these old men out of the Navy whom God in his providence had let live—as a court. The crime was that they had lived too long. They had been brave, gallant, and temperate men. They had lived too long, and therefore they were crowded off without a knowledge of what it was done for. I knew, but they did not. The honorable Senator from Michigan, lawyer as he is, speaks of that as a trial by which these old men have been condemned. What trial did Commodore Stewart have? I can speak his name, because it is historical. What did he know of what was going on against him? What did that man, who was maintaining the honor of your country at Puget sound, know? What did these men who were facing all the combined dangers which were to be found on the coast of Africa—taking their lives in their hands, and going with your commission in their pockets, and the flag of their country over their heads, doing and daring all that men could do and dare—what did they know of the charges that were being brought up against them, and which were to consign them to infamy and disgrace before the country? Talk of that as a trial! Why, sir, in my country, a man who would whip a dog on such evidence would be put under guardianship. [Laughter.] No, sir; it shall not be called a trial in my hearing without my challenging it. It was not a trial.

Again, the honorable Senator from Michigan speaks of these men as having been twice tried, and twice condemned! What is the second trial? What does this resolution propose? Does it propose to alter the law? Not at all. Does it propose to introduce new evidence? No; but simply to take the record as it is; take the story as it is told; take the facts as they appear; and if, upon that showing, and upon that record, without any further evidence, and without any hearing, the Chief Magistrate of the United States is of opinion that the men are fairly and rightfully entitled to their places, he can say so.

But there is another difficulty suggested by the honorable Senator from Michigan, and I am sorry to differ from him so much; I was in hopes of late he was coming to a ground where he and I could better agree. [Laughter.] He says we must not do this because there are some other gentlemen who have some how or other got into places by the action of these double courts, and it would be unfair to disturb them. I had that same logic played on me the other day, as I came from home to Washington. I had a very comfortable seat. By the rules of the cars I was entitled to it. I happened to step out, and one of these gentlemen (not one of these, but one of that school) got in and obtained my seat. I went along and asked him to give it up to me, and he bristled up and felt injured. He appeared to think I was trying to take that which belonged to him. He had got it, and had read somewhere that possession was the best evidence—nine points of the law, says the Senator from North Carolina, (alluding to Mr. Badger, lately a respected Senator from that State, who happened to occupy the seat of a Senator,) [laughter;] and he was unwilling to give it up. He had the same sort of feelings which the Senator from Michigan has for these gentlemen. I say if these gentlemen have got into these places, they have got into them wrongfully; they have got into them by some sort of prejudice that exists in some minds that these dismissed officers have had a trial which they never have had.

I need not say to the Senate (because I have said it before, and it will be known by those who care to know what I think) what my opinion is of this whole proceeding. It is that it is disgraceful to the country, that it is a reproach upon our history, and it will stand so. As long as there is a victim of this injustice, I do not care where he comes from, high or low; he may be the gallant old commander of the Ironsides, whose fame cannot be obscured by these men, or he may be the humblest individual smarting under their injustice—so long as such a case exists, and so long as I have a voice in the public councils, or out of them, my voice shall be heard to vindicate that wrong and to do them justice.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not propose to detain the Senate long, but justice to myself requires that I should make a few remarks. I voted before for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, to allow the President to nominate officers for restoration to the active list, only in cases of vacancies occurring, when the number of officers should become such as is authorized by law. In that I think I was mistaken; and I intend, when the opportunity arises, to correct it as far as my vote goes; and I wish to give some reason for this change of position.

In the first place, if the President is to examine the reports of the courts of inquiry, and is, on examination, if he approves them, to recommend an officer here, by nomination, for restoration to his rank, I take it that implies that if he, on examination, disapproves them, he will not recommend him here by nomination. In relation to those whose applications the courts have rejected, I understand he does not feel himself at liberty to do anything, and by the law, as it stands, he is not authorized to do anything. I think that should be corrected. If the President has a right to reject those cases which the courts approve, clearly he ought to have the right to recommend cases which the courts reject. It seems to me that this is one of those legal corollaries which every lawyer will well understand. Now, however, you do not leave him the power of examining those cases which the courts reject. That, so far from commending itself to my acceptance, is the very reverse of the ordinary course of legal proceedings. If a man, who is tried for a crime, is acquitted, we let him go; but if he is convicted he has a chance for a new trial. Here you propose to reverse this order. To be sure, if the result is in a man's favor it may stand; but if the man is convicted, if the finding is against him, you do not allow him any relief. This seems to me to be directly contrary to the ordinarily received usages and practices of legal proceedings. The persons against whom the court have found, the persons whose applications have been rejected, are those who need relief. For this reason I have always been of opinion that I should vote for this resolution giving the President power to examine those applications which the court rejected, and to grant relief if, on examining the record, he thinks relief should be granted.

But, sir, in relation to the other feature of the case—whether we shall do this justice by restoring these officers now, or shall wait until the Navy be reduced to the number fixed by law—I must acknowledge that I was rather of the impression that it was desirable we should not increase the Navy; but on more mature reflection I think I was in error on that point. We have already advanced men to appointments in the Navy to fill the vacancies occasioned by the action of the first board. We have agreed to advance others who have been recommended by the new courts, and nominated by the President, if, on examination, we agree with him in opinion. By this means we have already provided for an increase of the number considerably beyond the limitation fixed by law. Now, suppose a man has been rejected by the courts of inquiry, and the President is of opinion that he has been improperly rejected, and wishes to nominate him for restoration. If we oblige him to wait for restoration until a vacancy occurs in his rank, he must wait until the supernumerary officers who have been added, shall all die off, and then if a vacancy happens in that rank, it may not happen in his old place. Suppose he was number eight; the vacancy may happen in number twenty, or forty, or sixty; and perhaps he may have to wait until there is a vacancy in number eight; and if so, he may never get there; or if a vacancy should happen in number eight, or above that, he could not be nominated to that vacancy until the supernumeraries beyond the number now authorized by law had all died off. At last his time comes; where will you put him? You should make him number eight, in order to restore him to his old place, and if you do that you supersede all those who came upon the list after his displacement. It seems to me that this will necessarily produce a great deal of disarrangement in the order of precedence in the Navy, and that, therefore, it is not desirable to wait until that period. If this justice be done I think it should be done now. When injustice is discovered, it should be corrected as soon as practicable.

I am further induced to this belief from the consideration that the course proposed by the resolution, without the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, will not add to the expense at all, especially in relation to those officers who are now upon the leave-of-absence list; because, if they be put on the active list, they will not receive full pay until they be placed in active service; and if they be in active service, they displace some one below them on the list who then gets but leave pay. Thus it is evident that this does not involve any increased expense to the Government. For these reasons, I entertain the opinion that the limitation, moved by the Senator from Virginia, had better not be inserted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have but little knowledge of military trials; but, from some experience in trials in courts of law, and some experience also in the administration of justice between man and man during the last twenty years, I feel satisfied that there is something in this proposition which does injustice or may do injustice to parties concerned. It must be borne in mind, Mr. President, that in these trials by naval courts of inquiry, or courts-martial, there is no provision for a new trial by the court itself; there is no writ of error; there is no appeal, except the appeal which is to be made to the Commander-in-Chief for his approval or disapproval of the findings of the court. And, sir, I place my vote here on the ground that in those cases where the court of inquiry has found in favor of an individual, there an appeal is given, because the President has the power to nominate that person to the Senate, and it may come before the Senate for consideration, and if the court has erred in restoring the individual to the active list that error may be corrected on examination by the Senate in executive session. But, sir, if an error has been committed for any cause by this court of inquiry by which the individual concerned is deprived of his rank, and, to a certain extent, deprived of his reputation, which may be dearer to him than life, there is no appeal. Is it not an anomaly in the history of the administration of justice between man and man, when, by the Constitution of the United States, if an individual be charged with an offense in a court of law it must be presented by a grand jury, he must be tried by a jury, he must have a fair trial by the court, and a court which is always empowered to grant a new trial; but here, when he is tried before a military or a naval court of inquiry, which has no power to grant a new trial after its finding is once made; and, if the court of inquiry decide against him, it is out of the power of the President to correct the error? Shall he have no mode of redress? It seems to me that it appeals strongly to the common sense, the common judgment, the common conscience of every man.

I shall not take up the time of the Senate; I have simply desired to state the ground on which I shall base my vote: that those persons who, for insufficient evidence, or for any other reason, whatever the influences may be or may have been, who may have been deprived of their rank, and to a certain extent deprived of the reputation which they may have earned in the service of their country, are without remedy, unless the resolution proposed by the Senator from Mississippi shall pass the Senate, and pass without the amendment which is proposed to it by the Senator from Virginia. I know the Senator from Michigan says, that if this resolution shall pass without this amendment, the President may nominate these persons to the Senate, and they may be restored to their places upon the list, and in the regular line of promotion, just in precisely the same position in which they would have been if they had never been displaced. Is there any injustice in this? If, for any reason, they have been improperly displaced, is there any injustice in restoring them to the position which belongs to them, to the grade and rank, and the opportunity for promotion, which is their right? There is no injustice in that.

But, in replying to a remark of the Senator from Mississippi, the Senator from Michigan puts this question: "Will not these men who hold the places which they once held, and from which they have been displaced, ever die?" Is it an argument to be addressed to this body, that these men, who have been wrongfully deprived of their rank and position, must wait for other men to die before justice is done them—that they must wait for their juniors to die who have been put into their positions? There is, it seems to me, no justice in an appeal like this to the consideration of the Senate.

I shall vote against the amendment introduced by the Senator from Virginia, and shall desire to record my vote for the original resolution as it stood when introduced, in the hope and in the belief that justice may be done in cases where it is urged, and where, from the statements made by honorable Senators on this floor, the most manifest injustice has been done to individuals who have been retired from the Navy.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I did not intend to say a word on this subject, nor to do more than by a silent vote to endeavor to do justice to these people who, I think, have been wronged; but I cannot help rising for the purpose of thanking the Senator from New Hampshire for the just tribute he has paid to that great man—a native and a citizen of my own State—who is justly the head of the Navy. Sir, without "old Stewart" you would have no naval history at all. He has done more for the renown of the Navy than all the men who lived before him, or in his lifetime; and yet that man has been stricken down and disgraced in his old age. Instead of thus disgracing him we ought to have paid him some such honor as we paid General Scott for his great services in the Army. If we have it not, we ought to have created the rank of Admiral, and conferred it on Commodore Stewart. But, instead, that old man has been disgraced in his old age.

I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Virginia to reconsider the amendment of his colleague for the purpose, as I hope, of doing justice to all these people; for, when you have once confided this discretion to the hands of the President, there will be no prejudice, and ultimately every man will be restored to his proper place. When these gentlemen entered into the service of their country, we made a contract with them, an implied contract, that so long as they behaved themselves well they should be continued in the service, and be promoted as often as opportunities offered. In place of that, after many of them had spent almost the whole useful part of their lives in the service of the country, we turned them out to pick up their living as best they can. We have treated them as a parcel of old stage-horses; we have turned them out to starve after we have used their manhood.

Mr. WILSON. I intend, Mr. President, to change the vote I gave the other day in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER.] I gave that vote because I did not wish to increase the number of officers in the Navy. We have already too many. I apprehend that that is our chief trouble. When the original bill was brought up in 1855, I did not vote for it, although I was present. I believed that we needed reform in the Navy, but I was in doubt in regard to that measure. I have no doubt that mistakes have been committed under that act. Yet I have no doubt that reforms, needed reforms, have been brought about by its execution.

This matter has been before the Senate day after day during the last two or three years. I think the Senate and the country are heartily sick of it. We have been importuned from every quarter. We have passed an act to remedy the action of the old board. Officers have been before these new courts, and they have pronounced upon their cases; but they are not content with this, for they come here and ask for the adoption of the resolution which is now pending. I thought it was reasonable to adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, to give these persons an opportunity to be restored, if the President should so decide, only when vacancies occurred; but, after listening to the statement of the Senator from Mississippi, whose position and whose experience in regard to the Army and the Navy empower him to speak with some degree of force, I have concluded to change the vote I gave the day before yesterday, and to place the whole matter at the discretion of the President.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the question before the Senate to be on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was carried.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. STUART called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to allow the increase of the number of officers on the active-service list as now authorized by law.

Mr. BIGGS. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] being called from the Senate by important public business, I agreed to pair off with him and not to vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Yulee—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Green, Gwin, Hale, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Jones, Kennedy, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Toombs, Wilson, and Wright—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have an amendment to offer, to add at the end of line twelve the words, "within six months from the passage of this resolution;" so that it will read:

He shall have authority, any existing law to the contrary notwithstanding, within six months from the passage of this resolution, to nominate, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. FITCH. If there is nothing before the Senate I desire to make an explanation, in part political, in part personal to myself. It is known that at, and immediately subsequent to, the period of the presentation of the President's annual message to this body, an eminent Senator took issue with the President on certain matters contained in that message. It is further known that that issue has excited considerable feeling and discussion throughout the country. On the 8th of this month a State convention of the party to which I belong assembled at the seat of government of my own State—the first State convention, at least in any northern State, of that political party since the delivery of the message. It is known, I presume, that the result of the deliberations of that convention was looked for with no little interest, not only by the immediate representatives of that State, but by others, as the first expression of public opinion which would reach here relative to the merits of the case involved in the issue to which I have alluded. While we were looking with no little anxiety for the result of its action, a general telegraphic dispatch was published by the newspapers, I believe of the East, stating that it had emphatically indorsed the Administration. Before, however, any authentic detail of its proceedings reached here, a special dispatch was published in the Intelligencer and Globe of this city, in the form of a resolution, purporting to have been adopted by that body, published under such circumstances as to induce the belief, indeed under such circumstances as showed a design to convey the impression, that it was the only resolution passed by the convention on the subject-matter of the issue to which I have referred. A construction, furthermore, has been put on that resolution which has been industriously circulated by the letter-writers for the Republican press in several of the northern States—a construction which made the resolution condemn the Administration and the Senators from Indiana who were sustaining its policy; and which made it sustain and indorse the Senator who took issue with that policy, although no mention of, or allusion to, the Administration or that Senator is to be found in the resolution.

Sir, I would not remain on this floor a moment if I supposed that in any act or vote I was not reflecting the sentiment of a large majority of my political friends in Indiana. Although the State convention was not a body which could properly give me binding instructions, yet it was an assemblage of my political friends, the representatives of that party to which I belong, and therefore a fair reflex of the opinions of that party; and of course its opinions, if they might not absolutely control, should and would at least color my action here. The impression which it has been industriously sought to create, that the convention adopted resolutions condemnatory of my course, would, if it were a true construction, place me in the attitude of misrepresenting the Democratic party of my State. I will call attention to the resolution as published in the Intelligencer, and in the Globe, where it appeared by itself, without any accompanying statement of the fact that other resolutions had been adopted by the convention, indorsing the President and the Senators from Indiana, without any accompanying reference as to any other action of the convention, leaving it, as already said, to be inferred that the resolution was the only expression of opinion relative to the present unfortunate issue. Here it is:

Resolved, That we are still in favor of the great doctrine of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and that by a practical application of that doctrine the people of a State or Territory are vested with the right of ratifying or rejecting at the ballot-box any constitution that may be framed for their government; and, therefore, no Territory should be admitted into the Union as a State without a fair expression of the will of the people being first had upon the constitution accompanying the application for admission."

I grant that the language of the resolution, as thus published—especially when accompanied with a positive declaration, as it was when it was exhibited in this city, that it was designed for the purpose—justified the supposition that it was condemnatory of the Administration, and supported the view maintained by the Senator from Illinois, in opposition to the President's opinion that it may be the lesser of evils, in view of all the circumstances, past and present, in Kansas, to admit that Territory as a State, under the constitution which it was supposed was about to be presented.

After reciting the acknowledged and correct Democratic doctrine, that the people of a State or Territory are invested with the right of ratifying or rejecting any constitution framed for their government, it proceeded to say, that "therefore" no State should be admitted without a fair expression of the will of its people on their constitution. Such a "fair expression" has been doubtless had in the case of Kansas, or at least an opportunity offered for it. The word "therefore" would imply that the convention intended to apply the resolution to the present as well as future cases. I am advised such was not their intention. The language of the resolution as it passed is perverted in the pretended copy I have read, by whom, or for what purpose, I know not, and care not. By some sort of telegraphic or other legerdmain, a word is inserted which is not in the original resolution—a word by which its meaning is made quite different from that meaning really attached to it when it was passed by the convention. The resolution, as passed, is a mere reiteration of the doctrine proclaimed in the President's message. It will be remembered that in the message he expressed his regret that the entire constitution of Kansas had not been submitted to the people, and said:

"I trust, however, the example set by the last Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State, may be followed on future occasions."

The resolution as passed by the State convention of Indiana, on the 8th of January, reiterated this doctrine. Here it is, from the official proceedings of the convention:

Resolved, That we are still in favor of the great doctrine of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and that by a practical application of that doctrine, the people of a State are vested with the right of ratifying or rejecting, at the ballot-box, any constitution that may be framed for their government; and that, hereafter, no Territory should be admitted into the Union as a State without a fair expression of the will of the people being first had upon the constitution accompanying the application for admission."

This is the very doctrine advocated by the President, and there is no justification in the language of the resolution for the attempt to so pervert its meaning and so misrepresent the sentiment of the convention as to make them indorse any gentleman or any party who might choose to take a position in antagonism to the Administration. The construction placed on the resolution as it was published in the papers of this city, and the comments of Republican letter-writers, imply the existence of a faction within the Democratic organization of Indiana. There is no such thing. In that State the Democratic party is now, as it has ever been, a unit, upon all matters of political principle. It recognizes no faction. None exists within it. Its members may differ upon questions of expediency, and relative to men; but there is little, if any, difference upon principle. It was a unit in support of the nomination of the President at Cincinnati, and in support of his election; and it will continue a unit in his support, unless in the very improbable event of his abandonment of its principles. There lies before me a letter from an active and leading delegate to the convention, in which he reiterates, in the language I am about to read, the sentiment that was proclaimed in the published debates of the convention. He says:

"What I wish to call your attention to, is that  who appeared to be considered a leader of the Douglas men, stated emphatically several times, and reaffirmed the declaration, when Mr.  stated it and appealed to him for its truth, that the resolution was not intended to apply to any measure, men, or locality, but as the statement of a general proposition, applicable to future contingencies. In that view of it alone could it have passed. Had it been regarded as implying any condemnation of the Administration, Mr. BREWER, and yourself, it would not have passed."

This, as I have said, is corroborated by the debate in the convention; for, as published, one delegate known throughout the State for his eloquent advocacy of the principles of the Democracy during the late presidential canvass, and a warm friend of the Senator he mentioned, stated, as reported in the Sentinel, "This was a convention of the national Democracy. There were no two parties. There was no Douglas party here." Sir, I am rejoiced that the resolution passed. It is a renewed declaration of a principle endeared to the Democracy—one upon which, I trust, it will always act. There may be an unfortunate difference of opinion as to whether the principle has been properly carried out in Kansas, in consequence of the difficulties in that Territory. But that is a difference only as to the extent of its application in a particular case. It affects not the principle. That remains the governing rule of action of every Democrat—a principle in defense of which we all rally.

Yet, sir, the spurious copy of the resolution has been used in this city, by whomsoever had it in possession, for the purpose of conveying the impression that it was a condemnation of the Administration and a support of a gentleman who has arrayed himself against it, on the extent and manner of the application of this principle, and the kindred one of non-intervention in Kansas, and this impression has been industriously circulated for purposes best known to those who have done it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have no desire to interpose—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BIGGS.) The Senator will indulge the Chair a moment. The Senator from Indiana, the Chair understands, has made a personal explanation. There is nothing pending now before the Senate for the decision of the body.

Mr. FITCH. I merely desired to show that I was not acting in antagonism to my political friends at home.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As allusion has been made to me, I ask the same courtesy.

Mr. FITCH. With the permission of the Senator, I will state that I only made the allusion because it was contained in the papers which I have been compelled to read. I have made no intimation as to any part the Senator has taken in it, if he has taken any, and I do not know that he has taken any.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not wish to make any point of order, but all this is very disagreeable to me. I think it ought not to be indulged by this body. I do not think it is properly a personal explanation. Party rumors and newspaper remarks, in regard to party conventions, are not properly in order as topics for personal explanations in the Senate. This is not the proper place for them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana addressed the Chair. The Chair did not know what his purpose was or what he was about to conclude with, but now understands it was for the purpose of making a personal explanation. It was permitted by the Chair—no Senator objecting. Nothing is now pending before the Senate. The Senator from Illinois, the Chair understands, rises for the same purpose—to make a personal explanation—and if there be no objection, he will proceed.

Mr. HALE. I shall want the same privilege to explain the resolutions of the New Hampshire Democratic central committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. As I stated before, I have no disposition to interpose one word in a matter between the Senator from Indiana and his constituents. Whatever differences of opinion, if any, exist between that Senator and those whom he represents, they are matters with which I have nothing to do; upon which I have no comment to make; and with which I have no wish to interfere in any way.

Allusion, as I said before, has been made to me in a manner which I thought perhaps required a word from me in reply or explanation. A telegraphic dispatch, of the exact purport of that to which the Senator alludes as having been published in the Intelligencer and in the Globe—I have not seen the Globe, but I understand it was in that paper—was sent to me several days ago. I read it, and laid it on my table in my library. The day afterwards several gentlemen called upon me, and asked if I had received any information from Indiana, and I read the dispatch to them. Two of them asked me if I was willing that they should take copies of it. I said, certainly; and they copied it on my table. It was not confidential. On the other hand, I had no desire to have it published. I had had it one or two days lying open on my table, so that any one could see it. It is probable, though I have not the means of knowing, that the dispatch got into those papers from the one sent to me; but it is possible that a similar one was sent to those papers. On that point I have no information. With regard to the intimation that the dispatch conveyed a false or erroneous impression, I do not think it is well founded. That dispatch, as I recollect it—I give it word for word as nearly as I can—was dated at Indianapolis, and was signed by three gentlemen. It stated that the convention indorsed the Cincinnati platform, and sustained the Administration. It also stated that the convention had adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That we are still in favor of the great doctrine of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and that by a practical application of that doctrine, the people of a State or Territory are vested with the right of ratifying or rejecting at the ballot-box any constitution that may be framed for their government; and, therefore, no Territory should be admitted into the Union as a State, without a fair expression of the will of the people being first had upon the constitution accompanying the application for admission."

It seems that the telegraph substituted the word "therefore," for "hereafter," and that is the only variation in the dispatch. But is it true that that dispatch conveyed the idea that the Administration had been condemned, when it stated in so many words, "Cincinnati Platform indorsed; Administration sustained; and also the following resolution adopted?" That was the dispatch. There was no possibility of any misconception. Whether the "following resolution" was any reflection on the Administration, every one could judge for himself, but certainly the dispatch did not say so. The only question is, whether the telegrapher in mistaking the word "hereafter" for the word "therefore," has changed its sense at all. The resolution, as passed by the convention, is:

"That we are still in favor of the great doctrine of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and that, by a practical application of that doctrine, the people of a State or Territory are vested with the right of ratifying or rejecting at the ballot-box any constitution that may be framed for their government; and that, hereafter, no Territory should be admitted into the Union as a State without a fair expression of the will of the people being first had upon the constitution accompanying the application for admission."

That resolution declares that the Kansas-Nebraska bill required that the people should have an opportunity of voting for or against their constitution before it was admitted. That resolution declares that, by the Nebraska act, the right to vote for or against was a vested right. Does it propose, then, to take from the people of Kansas a right vested by the organic act; a right guaranteed by the Cincinnati platform; a right indorsed and reaffirmed by the President's inaugural address? No, sir; they declare that the right to vote for or against the constitution being vested by the Kansas-Nebraska act, hereafter no Territory should be admitted as a State unless that fair expression has been had and shall accompany the application for admission.

The people of Kansas have not yet applied for admission. They have not yet sent up their constitution, though it is probable that during the present session they will send it here. It is probable that "hereafter," to wit: during this session, they will send up that constitution; and the Indiana convention say that that constitution should not be accepted unless it be accompanied with evidence that it was adopted by the people on a fair vote, when they had a right to vote for or against that constitution.

Sir, take that resolution as it is; and if I understand it aright, it is a clear and unequivocal expression of opinion that when Kansas shall come with a constitution, if there is not the evidence that it has been submitted to the people at the ballot-box for ratification or rejection, it should not be admitted into the Union. "Hereafter" implies that the application is to be made "hereafter," in contradistinction to the cases cited in debate where, heretofore, when there was no opposition, we have admitted States without their constitution being first submitted to the people; for instance, the Florida case, and perhaps one or two others; but "hereafter" it is not to be done. "Hereafter" applies to the applications to be made hereafter; and to show that it meant Kansas, it says that the right to have it thus submitted for rejection or ratification was guaranteed in the Kansas-Nebraska act; that it is a vested right under that bill; and consequently you cannot take it away from them in this case. Was it the meaning of that convention that you should take from the people of Kansas, in regard to the application which they are about to make, a vested right—a right not only vested by the Kansas-Nebraska act, but indorsed by the Cincinnati platform, and reaffirmed in the President's inaugural? No, sir. It is clearly stated there, that hereafter that thing must not be done. They stand by the President. They approve of his course as they understand it. I have shown you in my speeches that I approve of the President's course on this question as I understand it; but I did not understand him as recommending the Lecompton constitution.

This is all I have to say. I should not have said thus much but for my name being brought into the matter. I have never interfered, directly or indirectly, with Indiana politics, and I do not intend to interfere with them. I was surprised to find that my name was mentioned in the discussions or the letters that have been written. I have no desire at all to influence, directly or indirectly, the proceedings of their convention. Whether the Senator from Indiana has construed their resolutions rightly or not, whether his action will be conformable to their wishes or not, is a matter into which I have no right to inquire, and do not desire to comment upon. It will be between him and his constituents; and whatever they shall say about it I shall take for granted is right. In other words, I propose to let him alone in his State, and propose that everybody shall let me alone in the State that I have the honor to represent.

Mr. HALE. I was going to trespass in the same way as has already been done, to interpose a personal explanation in reference to this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Briggs.) The Chair will repeat, that there is no question now pending before the Senate. Does the Senator from New Hampshire rise to a personal explanation?

Mr. HALE. I cannot exactly call it personal, but it is personal as much as the explanations that have been made are. [Laughter.] I wanted to explain the proceedings of the New Hampshire Democracy on the Lecompton constitution.

[Laughter.] It comes as near personal as the others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITCH. If the Senator will allow me to complete the explanation in regard to Indiana, I will not object. I give warning that I will not go off into a discussion of Kansas matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If any Senator objects to this discussion, it must close.

Mr. FITCH. I desire to say a word or two in addition to what I said before.

Mr. HALE. I will sit down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana desires to make a personal explanation. There is no question now pending before the Senate.

Mr. FITCH. I desire to continue the explanation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is no objection, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator from Indiana will proceed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITCH. The Senator speaks of some dispatch other than the resolution. The dispatch to which I referred was the resolution itself—nothing else. The Senator says he received it, and from his library the copies of it went out. From thence, then, probably, went the construction of it to which I have alluded as an improper one. I dislike to have those whom I represent misrepresented here, either by myself or any one else. The Senator from Illinois places his own construction on the resolution. It is his right to do so. I do not object to that; but I greatly prefer that the explanation of my constituents, the Democrats of Indiana, should be the one received, and not that his should go abroad again as it has done from the Senate heretofore through the press and letter-writers. He places his own construction on the resolution; they put theirs. I think the actors in the scene are far better entitled to have weight given to their testimony than the Senator himself, who is an outsider and directly interested in putting such construction on it as will sustain him. If any construction of the resolution has been given, as it has, which would make it condemn myself and colleague, I think, notwithstanding what was said by the Senator from Georgia, that it is a proper subject for personal explanation; for I do not believe that Senator or any other would desire to sit here misrepresenting his constituents, as would be the case if I were here subsequent to the adoption of a resolution by my party friends at home condemning my course and lauding that of another gentleman who was opposed to that course. If it was the design of the convention to sustain and indorse that gentleman (the Senator from Illinois) against the President and the Senators from Indiana, why did it not adopt the resolution as first introduced? In that shape it would have sustained him; but they amended it in such a manner as to make it sustain the Administration and not him. The resolution as adopted was materially different from the one first introduced. As adopted it is a general declaration of an abstract principle, to which the entire Democratic party was committed, a principle which I have defended with its kindred one of non-intervention for years, and I have admired the courage and talent with which the Senator from Illinois himself defended them. It was a declaration of principle to which no good Democrat would take exception, a declaration affirmed by the President in his message, and it was in part because he had affirmed it that the convention sustained and indorsed him. No exception can be taken to the resolution. It is right, and rightly adopted. It is only the use to which it is sought to be applied here that I except, a use not warranted by its language.

I have no disposition to go off into Kansas matters, or into any discussion or quibbling as to the meaning of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, or anything of that kind. All that will be the subject of discussion when Kansas matters properly come before us. The Senator, however, makes a distinction which does not in fact exist; he says the word "hereafter," in the resolution, applies to the present Kansas matter. You know, sir, and the whole world knows, that we are now deemed to be acting on the Kansas question; that is considered as before us, and therefore the word "hereafter" does not apply to it. It is now here under discussion. If the constitution is not here, certainly the message and documents on the subject are. The word "hereafter" in the resolution, like the President's language in his message, refers to any "future" case. The present case—Kansas—has difficulties and complications surrounding it which may well create diversity of sentiment as to the proper method of managing it.

I was very glad to hear the Senator from Illinois disclaim any intention, past or future, to interfere with Indiana politics; for I am sorry to say, if such has not been his intention, that he has been sadly misrepresented by his friends. Two of his friends from the city of his residence were, I am well informed, in and about the Indianapolis convention of the 8th, seeking to control its action, and professing to represent his interest. They were charged, or at least one of them, I understand, with being there, and having been sent there for that purpose; and the one thus charged had not the hardihood to deny it. They were not carrying out the doctrine of non-intervention. I am glad he repudiates their agency and their acts. I know that he has thousands of friends in Indiana; and he has had no better friend in that State than myself. I have advocated his policy with pleasure through more than one canvass, and I would do it again with all the more pleasure if that Senator should be our political standard bearer, entertaining now the views of non-intervention which he has entertained in the past.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere in this matter at all, but I think there is something due to the truth of history. I understand that I am speaking at the mercy of everybody here, and anybody can stop me; but I say that when you come to consider the resolutions of the Democracy of Indiana, and some others which preceded them, they should be tenderly treated; because you have been pushing the Democracy of the North very hard—very hard indeed. You have pushed them so hard that there is no place where they can live in the New England States except the custom-houses and post offices. Those are the only places they have left in which to live. I have no doubt they begin to feel this pressure in Indiana, though they have stood up pretty manfully there, and I have equally as little doubt they have been very badly gored in Illinois; hence when you come to speak of their resolutions, they should be treated with a tender consideration of all these premises.

I said that I would not interfere in this quarrel, and I have not a word to say about the Indiana resolutions, except that they are not original. They are a plagiarism. I have sent for, but I have not been able to obtain, a paper containing the original. The original was adopted at a meeting of the Democratic State central committee of New Hampshire, held about a fortnight ago. We have an election to come off there in about two months; and in that State it is a hard time generally, and especially with the Democracy, in view of what is coming, as well as what is. They met in Concord before the Indiana convention met, and took the matter into consideration, and they labored upon it. It was not a mass convention, but some twenty of the sachems met, and they ciphered out a scheme, a theory, a plan, which the Indiana folks have adopted; but I think it would have been better if they had waited to see how it succeeded in New Hampshire before they took it.

I will tell you what the New Hampshire plan was. They resolved that they were in favor of the Cincinnati platform and the Kansas-Nebraska act, and very much opposed to the Lecompton constitution. Well, sir, that was all well enough; but, considering the localities—the custom-houses and post offices—what was to be done with Mr. Buchanan? That was the hard part of the case, and I will tell you how they got over it. They resolved that they were very much opposed to Mr. Buchanan's measures but very much in favor of him. [Laughter.] They were entirely opposed to this measure of pushing a constitution on a people against their consent, but exceedingly in favor of the man who is doing it. [Laughter.] That is the platform on which they are going into the campaign on the second Tuesday of March. If the Indiana folks were not in a hurry—I do not wish gentlemen to push back Timeo Danaos on me—it would have been better had they waited until the second Tuesday in March, and seen the result of the plan of indorsing a man and repudiating his measures. They are very much opposed to forcing a constitution on a people, and very much in favor of the man who is doing it! My own impression is that the Democracy of New Hampshire will get one credit by it, and only one. I do not think they will get success, but they will get the credit of originality, and I think Indiana has done them injustice in that particular.

Mr. FITCH. Will the Senator from New Hampshire read the other resolutions adopted in Indiana, and see if they were copied from New Hampshire?

Mr. HALE. I do not think they were.

Mr. FITCH. They emphatically indorse the Administration and its measures too.

Mr. HALE. They have not been pushed so hard there as in New Hampshire. [Laughter.] They can afford to be a little bolder there than they can with us. All they have done with us is to repudiate the measure and praise the man.

Having made this explanation, I thank all the Senators, collectively and individually—because anybody could have stopped me—for the opportunity to interpose this explanation; and having said this, I give notice that I am going to object to anybody else putting in. [Laughter.]

On motion of Mr. BIGLER, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. ANDREW G. CAROTHERS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PHELPS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] moving the reference of a certain portion of the message to the Committee on Military Affairs; and that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. In the remarks which I made last evening, Mr. Chairman, I undertook to show that it has been the policy of this Government, from its earliest history, to endeavor, in various ways and in different sections of the Union, to restrain its citizens lest they should involve us in difficulty and war with other nations of the earth. I appeal to you, sir, and to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] whether, in every instance where this Government has exercised this power, it did not appear necessary and proper, and did not restrain our citizens within due limits without imposing upon them improper restraints; and whether it did not, at the same time, secure to this country its peace and honor among the nations of the earth? Why, sir, what would have become of our relations at the mouth of the Mississippi river, if it had not been for the check given to Burr and his expedition? We would have been involved in war with Spain, so as to have precluded the possibility of a treaty which soon after secured us that country, which would probably have still belonged to Spain. Instead of having representatives here from the State of Louisiana and the State I have the honor in part to represent, that vast territory west of the "Father of Waters" might still have been retained and represented by the hidalgos of Old Spain.

In the instance referred to as the interposition by President Monroe, to prevent incursions into Florida, and the usurpation of power by a lawless foreign invader of Spanish domain, that also saved to us a change of government which, in all probability, would have long postponed, or perhaps entirely defeated, the treaty which secured to us the two Floridas. And such was the encroachment upon the territory of the gentleman from Georgia that, had it not been for the interposition of the Government, that State might have fallen under the control of the Spanish or the revolutionary authorities, and there would have been no Representatives in this Hall from that State. It has been by the restraint which the neutrality laws have put upon our citizens, that our country has been sustained in its position among the nations of the earth, and that our citizens have been prevented from lawless assaults upon neighboring nations, with whom our country has maintained relations of friendship and peace. Is there any cause now? do recent events—does the history of our country for the last few years, impose new necessities for the repeal of these neutrality laws? I argue that there are none in the past history of the country; and if gentlemen will contemplate the policy of our Government during the last four or five years, they will see how unfortunate it is that these laws have not been executed against various repeated disturbances of neighboring Republics. So far from recent events presenting an argument for repealing these laws, the misfortune is that, either in their form, or because of negligence on the part of the late Administration, these laws have not saved our neighbors from devastation, and our national honor from unfortunate reproach.

Mr. Chairman, the expedition of this man, Walker, which has given occasion to the present debate, is the strongest possible evidence of the necessity of a vigilant execution of the neutrality laws, and their maintenance, or enlargement of their power to restrain wrong. If these laws had been better executed—if the Administration had not, to some extent, permitted these expeditions to have gone on, we would now have no occasion to discuss this matter in this Hall. There would then have been no controversy as to the relative merits of this General Walker and one of the commanders of our Navy, who took and sent him home as a criminal escaped from the justice due him; and the question would not be before us as to which of them was the better man—he who led the expedition, or the man who checked and concluded it.

Why, sir, is this country induced to take up this question of Central American affairs? Why has our attention for years past been called to that particular theater instead of the eyes of the nation being turned to the development of the interior of our own country. I think there is a fundamental error in the assumption upon which all this Central American sympathy is based: that is, that Central America is the especial or only route for the highway of nations; and being such a peculiar locality, it should be controlled by us. Where is Central America? You who live upon the sea-board, and are in the habit of contemplating distances as immaterial when you have connections by sea—you may regard the distance of trifling importance; and because your vessels often float that way, you feel that the distance to Central America is comparatively short; but we who live in the central portion of this Union look at the long line of travel before that territory can be reached. We have to pass all the Mexican States; we have to pass a thousand miles through or round a Republic that is always a political antagonism to our own; we have to pass a dominion where the inhabitants speak a different language, adopt a different religion, and different institutions. Eight millions of Mexican inhabitants lay between this country and Central America. Central America is, therefore, not contiguous; is very remote; and there are intervening all the States of Mexico, all of which are political antagonisms to us. Why, then, do gentlemen turn their eyes so far away from our own country to seek for an opportunity to display our patronage and power? Why do they go beyond the Rio Grande for the purpose of exercising the functions of this great Republic? Why are our citizens stimulated, by frequent reference to these Central American States, to go to seek for themselves fortunes and fame far beyond their own country? It is because of this fundamental error which exists in this country in regard to Central America being the route for commerce, and, therefore, the key to this continent.

This, Mr. Chairman, brings me to the second proposition in view of this particular point. What is Central America? It is an iron ligament connecting the twin sisters of North and South America. Instead of being a single point, as many imagine looking at the maps in circulation, it is a long range of mountains more than one thousand miles in length; having, therefore, on both sides, at least two thousand miles of sea-shore, equally accessible to all the nations of the earth. It is mountainous, and a wilderness inhabited only by semi-savages, although people of all nations, for years past, have had full knowledge of its advantages, and the utmost facilities to settle and become permanent citizens. It is a sultry and sickly region of the earth, and therefore shunned by all who are not compelled to remain there from demands of most important business or public duty. It was not inhabited by the Spaniards who first conquered it; and, sir, it will not be inhabited by the people of this country as long as our broad savannas, rich prairies, and fertile fields of the West, are open to cultivation. In the face of these physical and local objections to this narrow, inhospitable shore, this Government has been directing its power and its patronage to the settlement and control of these Central American States, to the great neglect and the diversion of settlement and travel from the interior of our own country. The whole effort has been directed to the accumulation of power, and, as the treaty says, to the protection of the neutrality of these Central American routes of commerce.

This affection for Central American channels of trade, which requires to go by sea two thousand miles before attempting to cross this continent, grows out of another error that water communication is better than land. I know that this idea has existed so long, that the great highway of nations will always be by sea, wherever seas can be found, and that land will be disdained for the commerce of the world, that my voice is too feeble to controvert or change its convictions on the public mind. I will not attempt it. Even if I desired to do so, I have not the time; nor would it be considered germane to the subject before the committee. But I will say that the time will come when it will be easy to demonstrate to the people of this country that the highway of nations will be by land, and not by water, wherever land of ordinary topographical features can be found upon which iron rails can be laid and locomotives execute their ordinary functions. If you were going to New York, would you, sir, go by sea or by land? Certainly, by land; for the voyage round by sea is circuitous and much longer. So it is from this point to San Francisco. The discrepancy is greater between the water and land route than it is between this point and New York. Would you travel from this point to Charleston by land or by sea? Unquestionably by land. And when you travel by land, you will transport by land; for most of the value of commerce will find the traveled route the most economical route for transportations. I tell you that the direct route to the Pacific is westward, across this continent; and it is not true that the highway of nations is by water, and by the isthmus of Central America.

These Central American States, as I have said, are comparatively a wilderness, barren, mountainous, sultry, and sickly, and those who have been there look back upon the country with dread or disdain. How many of our citizens have perished there on their way to California and on their return? Why, sir, they have gone down to their watery graves, not in single file, but in great armies, and the route by sea and by land has been strewn with the nation's victims that have perished by the way. The isthmus through which they passed is covered with the rounded earthy monuments that mark the path of death and desolation at almost every step of this favorite way. Such is the character of the Panama route; and take any of these proposed lines, and you will find the same obstruction and the same forbidding aspect to deter the world from preferring the isthmus when other more congenial countries have lines constructed through. I say, further, that the length of line which you attempt to hold power over is a serious objection to adopting this country as a dominion for us to maintain or protect. I submit, therefore, that it is an error to suppose that Central America is the key of this country, and if it were you have not the power to hold, maintain, and protect it. A thousand miles on either side gives two thousand miles of sea-coast to protect. The President suggests, in his recent message to the Senate:

"We desire, as the leading Power on this continent, to open, and, if need be, to protect every transit route across the isthmus, not only for our own benefit, but that of the world, and thus open a free access to Central America, and through it to our Pacific possessions."

Then he is for opening every route through the isthmus, and then he also proposes "if need be to protect" them. Do you not see that you are undertaking too much? What are you attempting to do? How many routes do you suppose are proposed to be made as transit routes through that isthmus? Commence at Tehuantepec and go down through Nicaragua, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Guatemala, and through all distant territories of that thousand miles of isthmus country, and you will find ten or fifteen routes proposed to be made great highways. Each one of these routes would require a Navy to protect it. How do you protect the Panama route? You have a treaty, which calls upon the President, as you perceive in his annual message, which requires him to keep a squadron of our Navy at each end of that route, "to guaranty the neutrality of the isthmus of Panama, through which the Panama railroad passes, as well as the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has possession over the said territory." You recollect the events which have already occurred. You have attempted by treaty and by the presence of your Navy, to take possession and hold this line, and it is now costing you millions every year to sustain that power. If you go on and undertake to possess yourself of these ten or fifteen proposed routes through the isthmus, what kind of an army and navy will you require?

At one time, Commodore Mervin had upon the Pacific shore seven hundred sailors and marines, and at the same time he had three vessels armed with ninety or one hundred guns. Three or four vessels have thus been standing sentry there to guard the shores of a foreign country. And upon this side Commodore Paulding has been required to keep under command a similar force, and that, too, while the country is at peace with all the world. What, then, would be the force required to defend "all the routes" which the President wishes to "open," and, "if need be, to protect?" Not four regiments, or seven vessels; but ten times this force will not guard all the entrances for all these lines. You are undertaking more than this nation can or will perform. Instead of going directly west to find your way to India, or to San Francisco, you start, according to our present isthmus route of travel, directly south, and you go by the ocean instead of by land. If the railroad connection is carried through our continent, you can go to California in five or six days. It will be in a straight line, while you now take a circuitous route—two long sides of a triangle, instead of the short line across the continent. And, should this Government embroil itself in a thousand difficulties and controversies for the purpose of holding this part of the continent, which in reality cannot be possessed and cannot be held? What, then, have we gained? Not the short or natural or safe route for commerce; but an everlasting tax on the people of this country to "protect and control." I say it cannot be held, because the country is too long, too remote, and too sickly; and it is too convenient for other nations to send in their navies, and too poor and mountainous to sustain a sufficient standing army.

There never can be a key to this great continent. There are too many open doors. There are too many passes through our own interior; there are too many through Mexico; too many through Central America; and too many through South America, for any one Power to control the destinies of this great continent, or the free passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific shores.

The argument which I wish to deduce from these enunciations is, that it is wrong in principle, as well as inexpedient and ruinous, for the Government of this country to set up a filibustering operation to secure the dominion of that country—for such, I aver, has been the policy of this Government for years past. It is no use to blink the action of the late Administration. Time after time have enunciations gone forth to our officers similar to those which went forth from General Cass, calling upon the police of the high-seas to check the adventurers which are going thereon. Yet many expeditions have been got up, in broad day, many times have they announced the calling of the roll and the embarkation of troops from our shores, and they have been permitted to go on without let or hindrance, although our Government could not have been ignorant of their repeated departures.

But, if we had been in doubt as to the indifference or acquiescence of the officers of our Government, the proof has been disclosed in a correspondence between General Wool and the Secretary of War. It appears that when that officer, then in command upon the Pacific coast, expressed a determination to check such an expedition, he was informed, by the Secretary of War, that such an act on his part was deemed unnecessary, and that he had better attend to matters more pertinent to military affairs, and leave the civil authorities to control the filibustering operations of the country. If we add to this act of the Secretary of War the fact that expedition after expedition has escaped the official vigilance, it is clear that it has been the policy of the Government, for years past, to blink or connive at the filibustering operations that have been going on in the country; and I therefore charge this, our present difficulty, as the legitimate result of the policy of a former Administration, which seems to conflict, in some respects, with the conduct of the present. It has been supposed by a former Administration, and by a new party, which now appears in this country, that the operations of private enterprise in the way of filibustering, and a general system by way of national treaty, national mail contracts, and other national expenditures by the public authorities of the country, all tending to the same end—the acquisition of southern dominion—might harmonize and operate successfully together. But now, as you perceive by the President's late message, and also by the argument of gentlemen upon this floor, it is found that the two kinds of filibustering conflict; that the attempt to get dominion by the Government in its action, and the attempt upon the part of Walker, are either inconsistent, or some one has made a mistake in playing the game. However this may be, the plain, blunt manners of Commodore Paulding have brought upon the Administration the necessity of silencing, for the present, the coöperation or interruption of the filibuster Walker.

Is not this the argument you find in the President's late message, and in his annual message for this year? Does not he, over and over again, reiterate the idea that it is necessary for this Government to occupy, to protect, and to maintain by power the various transit routes of that Central American country? And when he says he will take all those routes, comprising the long distance of one thousand miles; and when he speaks of further treaties which are being made between us and the Central American States, am I not right in presuming this Administration is engaged also in a different but efficient way to carry on a national instead of a private species of acquisition, which may properly be defined as national filibustering? I ask you what remains to the dominion of those Central American States? If we can go on and take that protection and guarantee of neutrality upon ourselves, I ask you how much power remains to the feeble States of Central America, when we have control of their lines of travel, and the requisite force which the President thinks should be at his command to sustain their "perfect neutrality?" We then become really the power of Central America; control of their transit lines includes all their lines of industry; for it is upon these lines that all the wealth and settlements in that country will inevitably congregate. I deprecate the policy of this Government going a thousand miles away from its own soil for the purpose of engaging in this kind of entanglement with other countries. It is against the wise counsels promulgated in the Farewell Address of Washington, against the principles taught by Jefferson, and all the patriots of this country, who have spoken of the policy to be observed towards other nations with whom we have intercourse. Let us therefore leave these Central American States to build their own railroads, open their own ways, take care of their own neutrality; and let us abstain from both national and private filibustering, and turn our attention to the development of our own vast interior, where our enterprise and energies will find ample field, and where the capital expended will remain among our own people. Such a policy will give employment to our people, activity to our industrial pursuits, and tend to preserve the continuance of peace and prosperity among the independent States of this continent.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to return to the position of Walker and the conduct of Commodore Paulding, for the purpose of presenting my views on their relative merits, since they seem to be forced into comparison or conflict by members of this House. I am not disposed to denounce Walker while he stands, or should stand, as a criminal at the bar of our courts. Neither do the high-sounding titles with which he is disposed to encircle his preposterous pretensions add anything to his consideration. Such titles have always been assumed by those who have determined to usurp the power which the titles imply. It was done by the patriots who marched to Canada. They were all generals-in-chief. That was done by McGregor when he made a descent upon the Florida coast. And such has been the course of Walker in all his expeditions. When he went to Sonora he assumed the title of commander-in-chief, and assumed the functions of supreme power. All this is only proof of a particular purpose rather than any right entailed by such a claim.

The question has been raised here, what are the rights of Walker in reference to his position in Central America? What right had he there? If in former expeditions he had acquired rights of property, they had been wrested from him, and he therefore had no rights, I contend, but those which proceed from mere assumption. His rights there were a fiction of law, too transparent to stand before this or any other audience; too faint and flimsy for officers of the Navy or of the Army to be deceived by. They could not conceive that he had any; and the accredited authorities of Nicaragua would hardly accord to him on their soil a fraction of domain equal to six feet by three.

What is the attitude of the Government of Nicaragua? That Government had implored you to restrain your citizens from lawless acts against her territory; and that, too, in view of the expedition of Walker himself, which he was then getting up against this unoffending State. Having thus a representation of the Government de facto, we are estopped from excusing the acts of Walker on the ground of any rights of sovereignty. If he ever did have rights to domain, they were given for purposes of colonization, like those acquired by Austin in Texas. But any one acquainted with Spanish customs knows that all such grants are dependent on the peaceable settlement and cultivation of the soil, all of which Walker forfeited by his assumptions of power and subsequent repulse by force of war. He must therefore proceed upon fictions; and we are informed that as soon as he landed, he assumed that everything necessary to his convenience belonged to the Government of Nicaragua, and that he was the Government. It is said of some of the blue laws of Connecticut, that the council voted that "the earth and the fullness thereof belong to the saints;" and secondly, "resolved, that we are the saints." This, it is said, eased the consciences of those who were in great need of Indian lands; I suggest a resort of this kind to my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER,] who informs us that "the Puritan descendants are in a tight place."

I do not deny that Walker went there boldly and bravely, and usurped a position which he held for a short time. But that position was lost by the efforts of the citizens of Central America, and he has no longer any right there, for he lost what he had by the fortune of war. How, then, is it that it can be maintained, or held here that he had rights, or that he is entitled to a higher position than that of the officer, who, on being called upon by his Government, arrested and brought him back to these shores, to be punished for offenses against our laws? But I have said more than I intended on the subject of Walker. I desire to say one word in regard to Commodore Paulding. It is not necessary for me to vindicate the Navy of this country. It is the province of other members of this House to do so. The Navy has vindicated its own character in many glorious achievements, and it is hardly necessary for any one to shield them from some reflections which have fallen against them. This Commodore Paulding has borne our flag for forty-five years gloriously on every sea. He comes before the world with honor unimpeached and unimpeachable. And yet, without a hearing, and without a trial, an attempt is made in this House to strip the epaulets from his shoulders, denounce, disgrace, and dismiss him from the service. These are terrible charges to bring against one who has long borne your standard, and now stands sentinel over your honor on a far-off sultry, sickly shore. What has this officer done to bring down such threats upon him? If gentlemen will examine the orders under which he acted, and consider the position which he occupied, they will find abundant cause to justify the act of a true and honest sailor.

It has been argued by gentlemen on this floor that the power of this Government does not extend beyond a marine league from our shores. Admit that. As there are some doubts on that subject, how did Commodore Paulding construe that law? It is admitted by all that the neutrality laws may be regarded as, in some respects, ambiguous. It was the province of this officer to obey orders, and not to cavil about the proper construction of laws. In matters of doubt, his orders should direct his course.

What were his orders? In the first place, they were transmitted to him beyond the reach of the marine league. Why were they sent beyond the league if they were not in operation there? If it be true that the whole power of the Government should have been confined to the marine league, why were these orders sent to him while he was stationed on the shores of Central America, a thousand miles beyond the marine league? The fact of their being sent to him there, shows conclusively that the Government had already construed the law to apply beyond the marine league. What, then, becomes of the argument as to Paulding's exercise of power beyond the marine league? He had the order, then, to apply them; how could he refrain? Instead, therefore, of this argument being applied to Commodore Paulding, let it be applied to the President; for to him, or to his Secretary, belongs the fault, if any exists, for having caused the exercise of that law beyond a marine league. Apply your censures to the principal, not to the agent. Stand by the dictum of law—facit per alium, facit per se.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The question is not whether Commodore Paulding had a right to act as he did on the high seas, but whether he had a right to do so on the territory of another nation.

Mr. CURTIS. I will speak to that point now. I am glad that the gentleman reminded me of it. I have cut you off from the position as to the marine league, so far as Paulding is concerned, and have thrown the responsibility upon the Administration of the country, because the orders were sent to Commodore Paulding beyond the marine league. The argument that came from the member from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] that he should not have acted beyond the marine league, should now be taken back, at least his censures of Commodore Paulding. But the question propounded by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH,] now is, should he have acted within the marine league of Nicaragua? I fully concur in the principle that the dominion of Nicaragua and of all other nations extends to the headlands and bays and to a marine league from their shores. But, under treaty stipulations, our vessels are permitted to moor in the harbors of Central America. Why are our vessels there? Why do they hang around the shores and within a marine league of Central America? For the purpose of protecting those avenues of trade, to interpose for the protection of our citizens in the transit over the isthmus. For what else are they kept there? They are there by the consent of Nicaragua and at the suggestion of her minister here, for the purpose of protecting the rights of our citizens and maintaining the peace of the country.

I go still further. I hold that Commodore Paulding acted in obedience to his instructions, within the dominion of Nicaragua; and I appeal to the orders under which he acted, and to the position which he occupied. He had first received the orders of General Cass, which amount to nothing more than this: "Be on the alert. Look out for military expeditions. See that the neutrality laws are not violated." Lieutenant Almy, however, was not satisfied with this kind of order, and, being here in the city of Washington when he received them, he applied to the Secretary of the Navy for more explicit instructions. He said, in substance, to the Secretary of the Navy, that the orders of the Secretary of State seemed to apply only to the high seas, and asked what he was to do in port. Look at the response which he received from the Secretary of the Navy!

I do not agree with the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. MOORE,] who spoke yesterday, who said the orders of the Secretary of the Navy did not authorize Commodore Paulding to take the steps taken by him. I agree with him that the answer of the Secretary of the Navy was ambiguous. It was such as left it an open question to approve or disapprove the conduct of that officer, whatever he might do. I am sorry there was not the courage and boldness displayed by the Secretary of the Navy to take the responsibility of his own act. Yet, sir, if you will read the order and take into consideration the contiguity of the question and answer, I think you will see that the man exercising power under it had the right to strike or not to strike, at his own discretion, or as he might understand this order. He inquired of the Secretary of the Navy what he should do. The answer was, "you have the power, use it." Now, sir, I maintain that an officer of the Army or the Navy, when he receives instructions, unless they are clearly and unquestionably in contradiction to law or reason, cannot go beyond them. Sir, Lieutenant Almy left Washington and went to Mobile. He told the people there that this Administration was determined to execute the law, and to stop these expeditions, and upon that information the United States officers there took active measures to prevent the departure of the expedition.

But, sir, was Commodore Paulding himself to act under the orders given to Lieutenant Almy? Most certainly he was, because Lieutenant Almy was required to report to Commodore Paulding, and the orders given to him by the Secretary of the Navy must then govern the conduct of Commodore Paulding. Now, if any man will read those orders, I do not think he can come to any other conclusion than that, under them, it was his duty to exercise a reasonable discretion; and, if occasion required, act within the port of Nicaragua. I have read the orders carefully, and I think that, for myself, if I had received the orders under which Commodore Paulding was acting, I could not have done otherwise than to have followed the course which he pursued, relying, as the commodore does, on the Secretary of War to bear me out, as it seemed to be his order to act.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from Iowa, that he should answer this interrogatory. I wish to ask him whether there is anything in the instructions given to Commodore Paulding which justified him in capturing Walker on the shores of Nicaragua? I am willing to concede that the President did give him orders under which he was justified in going outside the marine league to capture Walker. That is the act of the President, and upon him will rest the responsibility. But I think that, for Commodore Paulding to go within the jurisdiction of Nicaragua for that purpose, was an act of war, and that Commodore Paulding is responsible for that act of war.

Mr. CURTIS. The answer of the Secretary of the Navy to the inquiries of Lieutenant Almy, in my opinion, did give that authority to his discretion, because, what was the order? It was not to take the vessel, but it was to stop the expedition. I think any man who will read the order carefully will come to the conclusion that the act of Commodore Paulding in capturing Walker was only the exercise of a reasonable discretion in the execution of his orders. His orders were to act, and when the emergency came he was not to stop to cavil about nice distinctions. His orders were to strike. He did strike, and I demand that justice shall be done him. If he exceeded his orders, the responsibility rests upon the President of the United States for not defining his duties more distinctly.

Yes, sir, Commodore Paulding stands before this House charged with a grave offense—in the language of the President, a "grave error." I ask gentlemen to look at the surrounding circumstances, and see whether he was guilty of any error. We have seen that Commander Chatard has been removed, and that the order had gone out for his removal when Walker was taken by Commodore Paulding. It will be remembered that he was removed for not detaining Walker when within the marine league of Nicaragua. The United States officers at Mobile have also been censured by the President. Three of the naval officers of the United States under the command of Commodore Paulding had been insulted, and when in full uniform were prevented from passing the lines of Walker's sentinels, and they demanded justice for their offended honor, which had been thus assailed. It is true that Walker says they were not in uniform, but they have certified that they were fully under arms—thus meaning the distinction which permits them to pass the lines of sentinels of all the countries, except those with which we are at war. This was a special indignity, which must have been pressed upon the commodore, as it seemed to defy the power of self-protection against indignities shown our Navy.

But, sir, there was further inducement for immediate action. There was the voice of woe and lamentation, which came up from the inhabitants of the country; the men, women, and children, saw their friends slain, their houses burned, and their villages left desolate. Murder and arson and robbery, he reports, had been committed, and the country was left to havoc and desolation. There was the cry for justice upon the part of the officers, and there was the cry for mercy from the people on shore. I say that under these circumstances, with the instincts of a man, the heart of a sailor, and the defender of our honor, Commodore Paulding could not have done less than what he did. He is a stranger to me; but it is enough for me to know he is one of our standard-bearers to induce me to render him this tribute of justice.

But, sir, Commodore Paulding needs no defense. If he were here himself he would vindicate his own character. I am merely calling the attention of this House to the circumstances under which he acted. He has been treated roughly and harshly for conduct which should have called for praise, not condemnation; honor, not disgrace; from the representatives of his country.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to argue that it is not the policy of this country to intermeddle in the affairs of foreign nations. The less we have to do with their responsibilities the better. I congratulate the people of this country on the general tone of the President's late message on the subject of filibustering, except so much of it as implies a willingness that the Government itself may proceed by some such means to acquire dominion and power.

I am willing to see our nation grow internally and externally, but I desire to make acquisitions only by fair and honorable means. I wish to see surrounding States attracted by our wisdom and virtue, and not forced in by stratagems or fraud. I desire, for this purpose, that our department towards contiguous countries should be especially conciliatory and generous. I have no doubt of our ultimate extension to the limits of this continent, but I leave that to the destiny of nations and the natural affinities that draw less to greater bodies. I wish to see the rights of the feeblest nation respected and maintained, and I subscribe most heartily to the sentiment quoted by the President, as a rule of national as well as Divine law, that "whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so unto them."

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, in arising for the first time in all my life to address any legislative assembly whatever, I confess that I do so with all that diffidence and embarrassment that might be expected to surround one under such circumstances. I am gratified, however, that I have the privilege, at this time, of rising to sustain what I believe to be law and order. I have seen the remarkable spectacle presented to this country of an Administration going out before the country apparently unsustained by its own friends. I have seen, sir, that on every message of the President of the United States to this House, or the other, opportunities have been taken to assail and to pick at him and his motives. In the message which the President of the United States has sent to this House, on the subject of our relations with Nicaragua, and in reference to the conduct of "General" William Walker, as his friends choose to call him, I am happy to say that I sustain him in every word that he has written.

What are the facts of the case of General Walker as presented to this House and before the country? He is not citizen of the United States. He has expatriated himself. He has chosen, sir, to say to the world that he will no longer be covered by the glorious stars and stripes of which we are so proud, and that he arrays himself under another flag, and has become the citizen of another country. What have been his acts and his conduct while a citizen of that other country? Brought home because there was a sympathy felt for him in this land of ours; brought home for the purpose of saving his neck—a thing for which he should have been full of gratitude to the Government of the United States—what, sir, is his conduct when he obtains liberty upon this soil once again? Instantly he proceeds to levy war, to enroll men, and to collect arms and all the munitions of war, for the purpose of using them against a country with which we are at peace. I have every sympathy for Walker, and for the gallant spirits who went with him to Nicaragua; nevertheless, while I entertain that sympathy for him, and for them, and while I believe that it is entertained by the whole country, I believe, sir, that it considers him, not as General Walker, not as the President of Nicaragua, but as nothing more or less than a filibuster.

Sir, the proceedings of this gentleman in levying war against Nicaragua were so well known to the whole country, that it was necessary that instructions should be given to the district attorneys and the other officers of this country to watch him, and to prevent him from carrying on that war which he was about levying. What does he do? He is brought up before a court in New Orleans and held to bail, a bail very easily given, because among his friends were men at the North and elsewhere who had schemes and designs of their own, and who were able to pay the $2,000 bail which this gentleman gave. But does that stop his proceedings for a single instant? Does that stop his designs for a moment? No, sir, he proceeds with all his preparations. He carries them on. He puts his men and arms on board a vessel, and he puts one of his own officers in the first instance, as I believe the newspapers stated, on board in command of that vessel. But when it is found that she will not be permitted to sail under the command of that officer and under the flag which he would have been bound to raise, if he raised any, the officer is withdrawn, and the American flag is run up at the fore, and her registry and everything of that sort is passed through the custom-house in proper order.

Sir, the vessel had on board the armed men and the armament of General Walker. Her clearance was obtained in fraud of our laws; and when that vessel left the port of Mobile, as I believe she did, she left in fraud of our laws, and evaded them. It is my opinion that the same law which was meted out to an American vessel which went to the coast of Cuba, should have been meted out to that vessel which was willing to prostitute the flag of the American Union to the purposes of the filibuster, General Walker. I believe that that vessel should have been seized; I believe she should have been tried before our courts; I believe that she subjected herself to forfeiture and confiscation.

Gentlemen have contended that there is no power in this Government of the United States to seize her own citizens even when they are levying war against a foreign country with which we are at peace, and when they are not outside of the marine league. I believe, sir, in no such doctrine. I believe, so far as regards the duty of this Government towards foreign nations, that it is the duty of the President of these United States and of all the authorities of this Government, under the law of nations, to restrain our citizens from any such act. What would be the consequences if every man who pleased might fit out a vessel, and like the old vikings of the North, sail out for the purpose of acquiring territory, and invading territories with which we are at peace? Would it not be to involve us, in all probability, in war with territories with which we are at peace, and with which we desire to maintain friendly relations? That would be the direct consequences; and the duty incumbent upon the authorities of this Government, under the law of nations, is to restrain such acts, and for the very reason that these consequences would be disastrous to ourselves.

But, sir, it is not the case of a citizen of our own country that we are considering. It is the case of a man who is no citizen of ours; who has no right whatever to appeal to us for any of the rights of citizenship. He has chosen voluntarily to expatriate himself. He has chosen, when this country had saved his life, when this country had thrown our broadegis around him, to save him from death, to come amongst us and levy war in breach of the neutrality laws of this country, if the law of nations did not suffice to prevent him from carrying on such an act. Why, sir, how does the case of this gentleman differ from that of Aaron Burr, with the single, sole exception that Burr was a citizen, and this man was not a citizen? So far as the records of the country show us, there was nothing ever proved against Aaron Burr making his conduct in the slightest degree different from the conduct pursued by General William Walker; and yet the name of Aaron Burr has been handed down to us, as it will be handed down to after times, coupled with the epithet of traitor.

Sir, I maintain that it was the duty of the President of the United States to stop this man in the first instance, from proceeding from our shores, with his armament against Nicaragua. I maintain, sir, that if he had come into this country of ours, had raised a band of a hundred men with whom he might seek to attack any city or any portion of our people, and afterward had gone to the sea-coast and got himself and men on board a vessel and sought to escape from the penalties of the laws of the country—I maintain that under the law of nations, and without the law of 1818, the President of the United States might have directed him to have been followed by our ships of war, and brought back for trial and condemnation, if the facts were proved against him. Well, sir, he breaks not only the law of nations in this case, but the statute law of the country—the law of 1818. He escapes from our shores under false colors, fraudulently escapes from our shores, and I maintain that it was not only within the power and authority, but that it was the duty of the President to send for him over the high seas, and have him brought back to this country. I think that the President stopped at precisely the right point, when he stopped at one marine league from the coast of Nicaragua. I am not in favor, even for any purpose of our own, of invading the territory of another country, even though good may come from so doing wrong; neither do I understand the President to be in favor of doing any such thing.

I do not coincide with my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. Grossbeck,] although I agreed with him in almost everything else he said, that the President had the authority to send, or that the force of this country, either the Army or Navy, had the right to go upon the shores of a foreign country to execute our laws. But the President does not go to that extent. He stops at the marine league; and it is my opinion that under the law of nations, as well as under the neutrality laws of 1818, he had the right, and it was his duty, to have gone just to that marine league on the shores of Nicaragua, and no further. There he went, and thus far he upholds his officers; he goes no further.

But, sir, I have been astonished that men in this House, while maintaining the rights of this General Walker; while maintaining his rights, sometimes as a citizen, and at other times as a mere man—I say I am astonished at their casting such censures upon that gallant officer of our Navy, Commodore Paulding. I care not whether he be descended from the Paulding who seized André, and refused a bribe of British gold; I care not who his father may have been; all I care about is the fact that he is an officer of the United States Government; that he had the epaulets of that Government upon his shoulders; and at the very day he was denounced in this House, by those for whom I entertain the highest respect, as having been guilty of an act of robbery; as having been a kidnapper; as having been guilty of unofficer-like conduct—that at that very day the flag of his country was floating above him; and that, I have no doubt, had occasion arisen for him to have done so, he would have maintained it gallantly and well, as his father, in the early days of the Republic, maintained the honor of his country.

Sir, what has Commodore Paulding done? Up to the very moment he landed upon the shore of Nicaragua, he and those with him were fully borne out to the completest extent by the instructions of the Government whose officer he was. It is not necessary for me to refer to those instructions. It would take more time of this committee than I chose to consume, but there is no man who will read those instructions, as given repeatedly to the officers of that squadron, and other officers of the United States, who will not agree with me in saying that up to the moment of landing upon the shores of Nicaragua, Commodore Paulding was borne out to the fullest extent by the Executive of this country. What, then, has he done? Knowing, sir, the extreme desire of this country to prevent this waging of war by this filibuster Walker against Nicaragua, knowing the extreme desire of the Government to prevent it, this gentleman, Commodore Paulding, perhaps with an excess of zeal, landed his men upon the shore and broke up the expedition.

But, sir, he had some cause to send his men there to hold this General Walker responsible and accountable. Look at the letter of Mr. Cilley, a lieutenant of one of our ships, who went with the other officers upon the shore, with the uniform of the United States upon him. He goes there, as he had a right to go, to the shore of a country with which we were at peace; and how is he met? Before his boat reaches the landing even, he is ordered off. He is told that if he attempts to land he will be fired upon. The epaulets of our country were to be fired upon. Our officer, going to a peaceful shore, was to be fired upon, by the order, as it was said, of General Walker, the commander of filibusters.

Sir, if there had been no other cause for holding these men to accountability, that, in my humble opinion, would have been sufficient cause. I pledge my honor, that if I had been in the position of Commodore Paulding, and if Walker, or the citizen of any country, had dared to direct his men to present their muskets at the bosoms of my officers, I would have held him to such terms as would, perhaps, have saved a good deal of discussion in this House about him.

But, sir, the President has, in his message, censured the conduct of Commodore Paulding. He has said that that officer committed a grave error. I agree with the President fully in that. I think that Commodore Paulding did, perhaps, exceed his instructions in landing on the shores of Nicaragua, and in sending these men home to the United States. But did he do so like a kidnapper? Did he do so like a robber? Did he do so like a man conscious that he was doing a villainous act? I have no acquaintance with that gentleman, and I am not here as his special defender. But I say, sir, that he acted not as a robber, a kidnapper, or as a man who was committing a villainous act. He knew himself fully. He knew well that his zeal had perhaps carried him beyond his instructions, and frankly, and in a manner manly, open, and above-board, he comes out in his letter to the Department and states that he was aware that he had exceeded his instructions, and that he was willing to bear such responsibility as the country—which ought perhaps to be grateful to him—might choose to hold him to.

I think that the censure contained in the President's message is sufficient censure for the conduct of Commodore Paulding. I think that against this little Navy of ours, which ought to be our pride, and which, in old times, was our pride, enough has been said. Enough has been done to destroy it. Naval courts have been instituted for that purpose. A Spanish inquisition, almost, has been placed over its officers. Many of them, gallant and true, have been degraded from the positions which they held. I am gratified, however, that many of them have been, at last, restored to the positions which they deserved to hold. I am not in favor of attacking any further the esprit de corps of this Navy of ours. I am proud of our Navy. I glory in the gallant men who expose their lives to the tempest and to the waves in upholding the flag of their country. I glory in those men. Although I come from the far West, where the plow, not the anchor, is our emblem, they will always find in me a defender.

Sir, I am opposed altogether to this system of private warfare which is now attempted to be initiated in the history of the country. There are three modes of private warfare, to all of which, and to each of which, I am opposed. There is piracy on the high seas, to which every civilized man is opposed. There is buccaneering—a system under which, in that barbarous age, men thought they could prey upon the Spanish Main and rob the Spanish-American towns. They attacked the towns for the purpose of robbery, and not for the purpose of holding them. Then, again, there is this system of filibusterism, which I conceive to be a relic of the dark ages. Under this system, men set out in their own ships, and with their own armaments, to take countries, not merely to rob them, but to hold them as conquerors. I am opposed to all this system. I believe that whenever we shall need Central America, or any portion of it, we have it within our grasp, and can take it. I believe that the proper means of civilizing these semi-barbarous lands is by emigration, peaceful emigration—not that emigration where the musket and bayonet are in the hands of the emigrant. Peaceful emigration is the proper course. When the day shall arrive that any portion of the fair and sunny South, from Cuba to the remotest province of Central America, is necessary to this nation, let the flag of the Union be thrown out, and there will be volunteers enough to march under it and take whatever may be thought necessary for us to have. For my part, I will march under no flag but the flag of the Union. I will keep step to no music but the music of the Union.

Sir, as to the resolutions before the committee, I have no objection to them. I have no objection to the reference of the President's message, or of any part of it, to the appropriate committees. I have not the slightest objection to the reference of the whole subject of the neutrality laws to a proper committee. I care not much whether it be to one of the standing committees of the House, or to a select committee. I am not prepared to say to what extent I would uphold the present neutrality laws of the country. I do not think it necessary now to express any opinion in reference to that, further than I have done. At a proper time and in a proper place I may again ask leave of the House to express the views which I entertain on that subject. I have accomplished all I intended to do now. I have, feebly, I know, but to the best of my humble ability, attempted to sustain the President of the United States in the views he has taken, and I have attempted to vindicate the honor of the epaulets and of the flag of this country. In doing that, I feel that I have only done a duty which I owe to myself, and which I owe to the constituency which I have the honor to represent.

Mr. POTTLE. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks I design submitting in the short time which I shall detain the House, I will not attempt to go into the great questions of national or international law which are involved in this discussion. They have already been ably presented from both sides of this House—I should add, from all sides of the House, for we have already learned that the present House of Representatives has more than two sides upon this and all other questions. Nor do I intend to go over the grounds which have been so ably presented during this debate, as to the technical rights of Commodore Paulding in the arrest of William Walker. I am satisfied to put that question in this discussion upon that high ground where I have no doubt it will be found when the excitement of the hour and the feelings which have been engendered by persons not altogether disinterested in this question shall have passed away, and when Commodore Paulding's acts shall be tried by that great public conscience which sooner or later must try all these questions, and render a decision by which all of us must sooner or later stand or fall. Sir, I venture the prediction, that with all right-minded men, with all disinterested, right-thinking men, there is at this time but one feeling in regard to this arrest, and that is a feeling of satisfaction that William Walker has been arrested in his career of crime, and that Commodore Paulding in this respect has only done what his country's honor and the laws of nations demanded.

I think that the satisfaction which we all feel in view of that fact will not be damped by any mere technicalities that may be raised in regard to his right to perform this service for the country. I am well aware that such technicalities can be raised. I know that technically I have no right to cast a bucket of water upon the flame which the incendiary has applied to my neighbor's dwelling. But in an instance like that I should hardly stop to inquire what were precisely my technical rights. I should proceed to do what good conscience, good neighborhood, and good citizenship required me to do in the premises, and should trust that my neighbor would not complain of the act. I certainly, sir, should not admit the incendiary to complain of me in his name. So, sir, in regard to Commodore Paulding; whatever technical doubt there may be in regard to the construction of the instructions given him, all practical men will applaud the act, and will certainly deny the right of Walker to complain in the name of Nicaragua, and will say that in this matter the commodore has performed his part to sustain that honor which has been badly damaged by filibustering expeditions within the last few years.

Sir, I heartily concur with the President in the view which he has taken of the honest intention of Commodore Paulding, and of the necessity of maintaining our neutrality laws; and in that view I will endeavor to sustain him as far as I can, even against his own friends, if it shall become necessary.

But, sir, that is not the point upon which I propose to address this committee. There is another point involved in this discussion, which has been but briefly spoken to by any gentleman. It seems to be taken for granted, upon all sides of the House, that we are to proceed with this process of Americanizing Central America; and it is upon that question that I desire to make some remarks. I desire, sir, to enter my protest against any such system of Americanization. It is true that it has been advocated by gentlemen upon all sides of the House, but I shall nevertheless enter my protest against it until I shall learn by what right we propose to Americanize Central America, and what are the precise purposes and objects to be accomplished by this "Americanization."

I wish to know, in the first place, by what right we propose to render this service to our southern neighbors? Have they invited us to Americanize their institutions? I concede fully the importance of the transit route; I concede the value of Central America; I concede that it is a country which it would be exceedingly convenient for us to possess; but I deny that, because it would be advantageous to us to lay hands upon the property of our neighbors, we should, therefore, be justified in so doing. I submit that there are no rights which it is necessary for us to possess in Central America which cannot be obtained by purchase, by treaty, or by some means far enough removed from any of these filibustering projects. I dissent in toto from all these projects to Americanize the central or southern portion of this continent.

And then, sir, I desire to know distinctly, from gentlemen advocating these projects, precisely what this Americanization is to be. Sir, if the Americanization of this or any territory is to be to give it the institutions manifestly existing already in fifteen of the States of this Union, and which the executive and judicial departments of this Government have declared to extend by the Constitution over all the Union, then I have to say, as an individual member of this body, I trust in God the last foot of this continent has been Americanized that ever will be!

A MEMBER. Amen!

Mr. POTTLE. This species of Americanization has already produced results which are apparent, and which no gentleman can mistake, if he will but open his eyes to the events that are transpiring. Sir, before we induce any other country or people to accept this sort of Americanization, it may be well to inform them of the difference between our institutions, theoretically, as contained in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution of the United States, and as they are at this time practically illustrated. It would be well to inform them that with us freedom means human bondage; the right of the majority to rule means the right of a conservative minority to control and take care of "factious" majorities, and make for them unalterable constitutions; that guarding the ballot-box means simply to surround it with ruffians and bayonets, driving from it honest and legal votes, and filling the poll-list with names copied from old directories in their stead. These are the things that they should be informed of, as a part of the Americanizing process which we are to give them.

Then, sir, you should go further than this, and inform them that the practical workings of this Americanization in the States where it has been adopted has not only been a curse to the very soil where it had been adopted; that it has exhausted and rendered the most fertile region of the earth almost a barren waste; that its effects have been to degrade labor, to prevent the development of the resources of the country, to deny intelligence not only to the slaves, but, as a necessary consequence, to the laboring whites; that it breaks up social relations, deprives labor of the result of its own toil, and sets at naught not only all laws of political economy, but all laws of justice and morality. Inform them that the practical operation of this peculiar Americanization which gentlemen are seeking, has been to reduce millions, not of slaves, but white men, to a degradation upon which even the slaves look down with contempt. This has been the Americanizing process which has of late been going on in this country; and if this be the process which is intended for Central America, then I repeat again, that for one, though I stand alone, I enter my protest against it.

What are the arguments which have been brought forward by gentlemen on both sides of the House in regard to this matter, and the process by which it is to be accomplished? My colleague [Mr. HASKIN] tells us that it is to be done by a system of grand larceny, carried on by the Government. I do not know that I am justified in saying this, after the gentleman's explanation; but if I understand his explanation made yesterday, in effect that he has looked at the statute and found that larceny relates to personal property, and is not applicable to real estate, and, therefore, he was not in favor of larceny, but was, nevertheless, in favor of putting in operation the principles of the Ostend manifesto; that he was in favor of the acquisition of this territory by the direct action of the Government, and not by such petty-larceny expeditions as this of Walker's; that he was not in favor of that kind of larceny for which he could be indicted, and that in what he said he but spoke the sentiments of the President, put forth in the special message; that the President had but elaborated the gentleman's idea in this matter; with all deference to my colleague, and with no unkind feeling towards him, I must say that when he stated that he spoke for the Democracy of New York when he said he was in favor of putting into operation the doctrines of the Ostend manifesto, and of national grand larceny in relation to Central America, carried on under the auspices of the Government, I doubted that he spoke the sentiments of the Democracy of the North; and I doubted still more when the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ADRAM] got up and repudiated that doctrine in behalf of the northern Democracy; and I must doubt that he speaks by authority of the President, or that his plan and the President's are the same—now that we are informed that the honorable member's plan really is. And I regretted that he undertook to shield himself from the remarks which his ingenious plan has provoked; by the common, but hardly commendable plan of charging them with those things which he had volunteered to profess himself in favor of. I dare say no one understood the gentleman as meaning more than that he was in favor of expeditions carried on directly by the Government, to accomplish what Walker was attempting in another way.

But, sir, I do not believe that we have fallen to a point so low as this would seem to indicate. I do not believe that it is now to be proclaimed upon the floor of Congress, with the sanction of the Executive of this great nation, that because we are strong and our neighbors are weak, therefore we are to take possession of what belongs to them without right, or the pretense of right, for so doing. But, sir, I am opposed to both of those means of aggrandizement. I am opposed to the plan itself, and it does not commend itself any more favorably to me after it has been put forth from another point of view, and painted in the rainbow tints of my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER.] But, sir, I should be doing less than justice to the gentleman from Massachusetts if I did not say, that I know that in his scheme of Americanization, this system of human bondage is excluded; and further, that it is intended for the very purpose of breaking the shackles of mankind. While I know this, I dissent entirely from the gentleman's opinions in regard to this matter. I can look forward with him in a fancy sketch to the time when, by the aid of steam-engines, a nation may be born in a day; but before I embark in this organized emigration, I must inquire what is to be the effect of this unlimited territorial aggrandizement which seems to be indicated by the gentleman's scheme and by the President's message.

I recollect full well the beginning of this territorial aggrandizement. I recollect how hard I fought against it when the country was asked to take Texas from the Government to which it belonged, and to annex it to this country. I then predicted, and so did thousands of others, what would be the natural result of all such projects; but we were overborne by public sentiment, and the scheme was successful. Without stopping to detail its progress we know how it led to the Mexican war, how it found us, and how it has left us. It found us a Government at peace with other nations; it found us a nation where, with all our wide-spread interests, a common brotherhood was acknowledged and felt, with political sentiments that found a response in every section of the Union. How has it left us? It has left us with sentiments so entirely at war that no system of policy can satisfy all sections, no platform of principles can harmonize us. It found us, as a nation, safe, tranquil, firm in our integrity; and it has left us not only at war with one another, but in such a state that I am afraid I should be justified in saying that there are those upon this floor who not only look for the downfall of the Union, but who seek it by this very system of territorial aggrandizement. It has already extended our frontier so that no power is adequate to guard it in time of war; no policy which can be devised can harmonize it in time of peace. Yet gentlemen upon all sides seem to agree that this system is to go on until the whole continent shall be absorbed.

My friend from Massachusetts is not willing to wait ordinary operations of these events, but wants to apply to them the accelerating power of steam. He is anxious to have "nations born in a day;" to rise up, as it were, in the twinkling of an eye. I sympathize with him in the condition in which he is placed, "crowded up between the Atlantic ocean and the Rocky Mountains." I know that he needs room and breathing space, and that he is anxious to put in operation this great scheme of colonization, of which I believe he is the author, and which I confess, in a certain direction, has wrought mighty results, as I trust, for good. I can sympathize with the gentleman; but before he rushes out of the country to get breathing space, before he rushes into the territories of nations with which we are at peace, and that, too, without invitation, may we not reasonably ask of him to wait a little, and to see how his scheme works in Americanizing Virginia, and restoring that honored Commonwealth to that prosperity of which her own unwise institutions have deprived her? The work is every way a worthy one, and in its accomplishment the gentleman not only has my warmest wishes, but the hopes and prayers of thousands for his success.

If he shall succeed in Americanizing Virginia, may we not further ask him to try to do the same with the other States of the Union, where it is so much needed; and then, sir, there will yet be left to him all our vast Territories for operation. Is it unreasonable to ask him to do this? And, in relation to this crowded condition, which is suffocating my friend, may I not go further, and ask him at least to wait until he can count the number of inhabitants on a square mile in any State of the Union, by the whole man, and not be driven to speak of the fractional parts of a man to the square mile, as he was compelled to do the other day. I honor the motives and feelings of my friend, yet I trust he will not be offended when I tell him that his scheme, and the scheme of my colleague over yonder, are, in my mind, but different features of the same filibustering spirit which makes us a terror to our neighbors, and has run this Government upon dangerous rocks, and which will yet run it upon rocks which will utterly wreck it, unless it shall be abandoned. I admit there is a wide difference in these features. Those presented by the honorable gentleman are attractive; those by my colleague hateful; but they accomplish the same subjugation of the country, whether it be by conquest or by organized emigration.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I should be glad if the gentleman from New York will inform the committee if he ever knew a great nation which was not a filibuster?

Mr. POTTLE. I can answer the gentleman in a single word. I never knew a great nation, in the true sense of the word, which was not a just nation, and willing to observe not only the rights of a great nation, but also of the smaller nations around it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman, taking his own definition, if he ever knew a just nation?

Mr. POTTLE. I trust we shall now be a just nation in this matter; and it is for the very purpose that my posterity, that the gentleman's posterity, and that those who read the future history of this country, may know us a just nation, that I insist that we shall not wrest power from our neighbors, either by conquest or organized emigration; and I insist that the present generation shall set an example of justice in regard to this matter. Now, I ask the gentleman if he ever knew a nation truly great, in the highest sense of that term, that did not respect with more scrupulousness the rights of a weaker nation than it did the rights of its peers?

But, sir, I obtained the floor to address this committee with the expectation that I should be brief; and I will bring my remarks upon this branch of the subject to a close. I sought nothing more than to enter my protest, that my constituents at home may know that, while gentlemen from all sides appear to be joining in perfect harmony in the opinion that we should have Central America as a matter of course, I at least opposed it, and entered my protest against it, as one of those projects which, if not arrested, will cause our country to fall by its own weight. We have increased in apparent greatness and magnitude; but I believe there is not a gentleman in this Hall who will not acknowledge that every foot of territory that we have acquired has only weakened the strength of this Confederacy, and has engendered an animosity before unknown among us. Were our institutions the same in all parts of the Union, this might not be the result; but we must take these things as they are; we must speak of them as practical questions; we must speak of institutions which we have, and not of theoretical institutions which we proclaim to the world, and have not.

I have but a single word to say upon another subject, and these are scarcely needed after what has already been said upon the same subject by the eloquent gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] I allude to the aspersions cast upon the Navy of this nation. I listened to those aspersions with pain, and I doubt not that every gentleman in this Hall listened with pain to these uncalled-for remarks. I doubt not, when the report goes out bearing to the country those remarks, which I will not repeat here—for they are of a character I do not choose to repeat—millions of people will blush and feel humbled that such language could be used in the legislative halls of the nation. I do not quite forget that, in the darkest hour of our country's history, under circumstances when we were unable to justify ourselves here at home upon land, our Navy upheld our flag and vindicated our honor; that, even while our Capitol was burned over our heads, covering us with shame, our gallant little Navy was wiping out that dishonor by deeds that cannot die. And when I listened, as I did the other day, to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GROESBECK,] as he spoke of the conduct of Commander Ingraham in vindicating the honor, not only of this country, but of humanity, I confess my blood boiled, and I felt proud that we had one part of our service uncontaminated; one part that had never been dishonored; one part in which the flag of our country had never been lowered a single inch to perpetrate a wrong, and which had never failed, in a single instance, to vindicate the right.

Sir, when the debates of this hour shall have passed away, when the little squabbles which engage us to-day during the time we have been in committee shall have been forgotten, and the aspersions which were uttered against our Navy shall sleep and be remembered no more, then those who read the history of this country will find emblazoned upon every page of its history the honorable action of this Navy; and not the less honorable, I venture to predict, will be the very act which so many gentlemen on the opposite side of the House have condemned—I mean the act of Commodore Paulding in arresting Walker, and thus maintaining the faith of the nation. When all the technicalities and the doubts which the ingenuity of gentlemen can throw upon it shall have passed away and been forgotten, then, in contrast with the lawless spirit which our country has winked at and failed to rebuke for so many years, will be placed the noble act of this faithful servant of the country; and it may stand side by side with the act of his ancestor, in reference to which gentlemen upon the other side of the House, as I thought ungenerously, and in a sneering spirit, spoke the other day, asking if the son derived honor from the act of his father—if the son was honorable because his father refused a bribe? I will say to that gentleman, that when the act of the son is placed by the side of the act of the father, the judgment to be passed upon the act of the son will need no support from the judgment which has been already passed on the act of the father. They will stand side by side, and will be honored together; and men will say that whatever may have been the corruption of the age, this act, at least, was in vindication of the right and of the honor of the country.

Sir, has any gentleman, in addressing this committee, pretended that Walker obtained a foothold in Nicaragua by other means than by virtue of the American flag? Did he leave our shore by any other authority? Did he cross the ocean under any other protection than that of our flag? Did he effect a landing on the shores of Nicaragua except under that protection? And are we to be told that our flag shall shield and protect a marauder till he steps on the soil of a nation with which we are at peace, and that we shall have no right to prevent his abusing the privileges which he has thus obtained under it—that we have no authority over him, and are under no obligations to restrain him? Entirely dissent from that doctrine. I say that where our flag guarantees the protection of an individual, we are bound to see that that protection is not abused. Sir, I claim that the same protection which gives him the right of landing in Nicaragua, and shields him from the guns of our frigates while that flag covers him, confers upon us not only the right, but makes it our duty, to see that advantages thus gained shall not be used against those with whom we are bound by treaties of friendship and peace.

I go further than the gentlemen who have addressed the committee. I say, that under the laws of nations, construed not by technicalities, but by that high sense of public honor which we must uphold, Commodore Paulding had a right not only to land and prevent this man from abusing the privileges which he had obtained from our flag, but that he had a right to follow him to any portion of Nicaragua, to prevent the abuse of these privileges, and to prevent our being precipitated into war by the criminal acts of this marauder.

Sir, in conclusion, I have to say that I hope the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] to refer the neutrality laws to a select committee, "for the purpose of having them amended, so as not to interfere with emigration," will not prevail. They need no amendment, unless it be to make them more strict. They were intended to interfere with and prevent just this kind of emigration that Walker was engaged in, and should be fairly, faithfully upheld and enforced.

Mr. LAMAR. It is not my purpose to discuss the various questions involved in our Central American relations. Should I avail myself of a future occasion to do so, I may be forced reluctantly to dissent from some of the views so ably presented by my distinguished colleague, [Mr. QUITMAN.] However painful this may be to myself, I nevertheless feel confident of his generous indulgence, especially when he sees in my course only the reflex of his own spirit of independence; a spirit which runs like a stream of fire through all his acts and writings, which enabled him a few years since to light up the ardor of a thousand patriots, to fire his countrymen to the assertion of their rights, and enshrines him in the hearts and affections of the people of his State without distinction of party. Mr. Chairman, any proposition which has for its object the advancement and progress of southern institutions, by equitable means, will always commend itself to my cordial approval. Others may boast of their widely-extended patriotism, and their enlarged and comprehensive love of this Union.

With me, I confess that the promotion of southern institutions is second in importance only to the preservation of southern honor. In reading her history and studying her character, I delight to linger in the contemplation of that stern and unbroken confidence with which she has always clung to the integrity of her principles and the purity of her honor. In that unfortunate division which has separated our country into sections, natural causes beyond our control have assigned to her the weaker section. A numerical minority finds safety and protection alone in the power of truth and the invincibility of right. The South, standing upon this high ground, has ever commanded the respect of her friends and defied the assaults of her enemies. When ruthless majorities have threatened wrong and injustice, their hands have been stayed only by the deference which the worst spirits unconsciously pay to the cause of justice. In the long and bitter contests which have marked our internal struggles, the South has made but one demand—the Constitution of our common country, the claims of justice, and the obligations of States; and it is our boast to-day that we can present a record unstained with a single evidence of violated faith or attempted wrong. The same regard for truth, justice, and honor, which characterizes our intercourse with the various sections of our own country, furnishes the safest rules for our dealings with other countries. As the Constitution is the law of our conduct at home, so let good faith be the rule of our conduct abroad. If I could do so consistently with the honor of my country, I would plant American liberty with southern institutions upon every inch of American soil. I believe that they give to us the highest type of civilization known to modern times, except in those particulars dwelt upon so elaborately and complacently by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER.]

In that particular form of civilization which causes the population of a country to emigrate to other lands for the means of subsistence, I concede to the North great superiority over our section. [Laughter.] There can be no doubt that New England, and especially Massachusetts, is a splendid country to emigrate from, and, in this respect, stands unrivaled, with perhaps the single exception of Ireland. [Laughter.] And right here I desire to express my acknowledgments to the gentleman for the very apt and classical comparison which he instituted between his section and the officina gentium. It never occurred to me before, but since he has mentioned it, I must confess to the resemblance in many respects between the recent emigration from New England and the irruption of the Goths and Vandals. [Laughter.] It is also due to candor that I should say that the gentleman's vindication of the emigrant aid societies places the objects and motives of that enterprise upon more defensible grounds than we of the South supposed to exist. For one, I am perfectly satisfied that the thing was demanded by necessity, and has resulted in benefit to all the parties concerned; that the country was benefited by getting rid of the population, and the population greatly benefited by leaving the country. [Laughter.]

To return from this digression; while I am a southern man, thoroughly imbued with the spirit of my section, I will never consent to submit the fate of our noble institutions to the hands of marauding bands, or violate their sanctity by identifying their progress with the success of unlawful expeditions. And most especially, when I see them receiving the countenance and sanction of a distinguished Senator, whose course on the Kansas question is so fresh in our recollection.

Before I consent to any new schemes of territorial acquisition, to be effected, as usual, by the prowess of southern arms, and the contribution of southern blood and treasure, I desire the question of the south's right to extend her institutions into territory already within the Union, practically and satisfactorily settled by the legislation of this Congress. These territorial acquisitions, so far, have been to the South like the far-famed fruit which grows upon the shores of the accursed sea, beautiful to sight but dust and ashes to the lips. We learn from the President's message that the people of Kansas having reached the number that would justify her admission into the Union as a State, she has, by her duly constituted authorities, taken all the steps necessary to the attainment of this object, and will, in a short time, demand the redemption of the pledge of the Government, that she "shall be admitted, with or without slavery, as her constitution may prescribe, at the time of such admission." But in advance of her application, we are informed by the distinguished author of the Kansas bill, and gentlemen upon this floor, that her case has been prejudged, and her claims rejected. This presents a question before whose colossal magnitude the wrongs of Walker, and the criminality of Paulding, sink into insignificance.

I propose to examine into the grounds upon which this violation of plighted faith is attempted to be justified. The ground principally relied upon is, that the constitution which she presents was framed by a convention not called in pursuance of an enabling or authorizing act of Congress, but on the mere motion of the Territorial Legislature. Now, sir, apart from the practice of the Government, which has not been uniform on this subject, I, for one, admit, to the fullest extent, the propriety and importance of such an act of Congress. I have always held that the sovereignty over these Territories was vested in the people of these United States; that the power of legislation in reference to them belonged to Congress, and that this power was limited only by the Constitution and the nature of the trust, and that before the inhabitants of the Territory are competent to form a constitution and a State government, it is necessary that Congress should first withdraw its authority over the Territories. The necessity of an enabling act, I concede to the fullest extent. Whenever individuals in a Territory undertake to form a State government, without the previous assent of Congress, they are, in my opinion, guilty of gross usurpation and flagrant disregard of the rights of the United States and the authority of Congress. Under such circumstances, it becomes a question purely of discretion with Congress, whether to remand them to their territorial condition, or to waive the want of authority, and to ratify the proceedings as regular and lawful.

The question now presents itself, do the circumstances attending the application of Kansas for admission into the Union present such a case? Was the convention at Leecompton an unauthorized and revolutionary assemblage, usurping the sovereignty of the State, and throwing off unlawfully the authority of the United States? I hold that it was a convention of the people, called by the regularly constituted authority, and with the previous assent of Congress. I hold that the Kansas bill was an enabling act, vesting the Territorial Legislature with power to call such a convention. In analyzing the provisions of that noble law, we find that it looks to higher objects and more enduring results than the mere organization of temporary territorial governments for Kansas and Nebraska. It looks beyond the territorial status; it provides for its admission as a State; and in express terms pledges the faith of Government that it shall be received into the Union "with or without slavery, as its constitution may prescribe at the time of such admission." It also declares the "intent and meaning of this act" to be, "not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act."

Now, had the bill stopped here—had it gone no further—there might be some ground for the objection that additional legislation by Congress is necessary. For the bill might guaranty to the people admission as a State, and the right of forming their constitution, and yet reserve to Congress the all-important power of determining when the people had attained a sufficient maturity and growth to fit them for the enjoyment and exercise of this highest and most glorious right of self-government. It might reserve to itself the power of determining who should constitute such a people—who should be the qualified voters—and in short, of prescribing all the steps preliminary to a call of the convention of the people. I say Congress might well have reserved all these high and delicate discretionary powers to herself, and there might be some ground for claiming them in behalf of Congress, had the bill stopped with the clause which I have quoted.

But, unfortunately for the enemies of Kansas, the bill does not stop here. It goes on to confer the most ample powers on the Territorial Legislature. In section twenty-two, after providing for the first election, it says:

"But thereafter the times, places, and manner of holding and conducting all elections by the people, shall be prescribed by law."

Again, after providing for qualifications of voters for the first election, it says:

"But the qualification of voters, and of holding office, at all subsequent elections, shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Territorial Legislature."

In section twenty-four, it is further enacted that the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution.

These clauses, taken together, embrace the entire subject in dispute, and vest all powers connected therewith in the Territorial Legislature. What can be a more clear and rightful subject of legislation than to determine the time when a people shall emerge from their condition of territorial pupillage into that of State sovereignty, of calling a convention of the people, prescribing the qualification of voters, and arranging the usual details preparatory to the application for admission as a State. Indeed, sir, according to the well settled maxims of civil law, no people can undertake to form or abolish a constitution, except in obedience to the summons or invitation of the existing legislative authority. It was in this view that Congress has delegated these high and important matters of legislative discretion to the territorial government. You may take up any enabling act passed by Congress, and you cannot find a provision in it which is not involved either in the specific grants or general delegation of powers contained in the Kansas bill.

The conclusion which the language of the bill authorizes, is strengthened and sustained by its history. When this bill was first reported, it contained the usual power, which you find in all territorial bills, of congressional veto, revocation, or repeal of the territorial laws; but it was stricken out, and the bill became a law, with no reservation of power to Congress touching this point, limiting the broad grant of jurisdiction to the Territorial Legislature over "all rightful subjects of legislation." If the language of the bill and its history could leave any doubt as to the correctness of this construction, it would at once be removed by a recurrence to the debates when the bill was pending in Congress. The speeches of both friends and foes are replete with the proof of what I say. I could quote from the author of the bill, and from its supporters in this House, to show that their object was to transfer to the people of Kansas the entire control over her internal affairs, including slavery, untrammelled by any congressional legislation. But, sir, it is not necessary.

It may be said that, if this construction be true, the bill embraced two entirely distinct and dissimilar subjects: one organizing a Territory, and the other providing for the admission of a State. Well, sir, if I am not mistaken, this very objection was made, to wit: that the bill was against all regular parliamentary procedure. And a distinguished gentleman from Missouri, after exhausting his powers of invective, like a man in fight reserving his most potent weapon for the last blow, threw at the bill an immense word, which sent our venerable Secretary of State stunned and reeling to the dictionaries. He said it was "amphibological." But the framers of that bill were not after parliamentary symmetry or harmony of outline. Their object was to settle great questions of strife which threatened the integrity of the Union; to bind in one compact and durable structure the equality of the States, the authority of Congress, and the glorious right of self-government; to build a platform on which the rights of every section in the Union might rise above the turbulent waters of sectional strife, and proudly defy all the attacks of fanaticism. In confirmation of the view I have taken, I desire to invoke the authority of the distinguished publicist and jurist who is now lending his influence to the enemies of the South and of Kansas. Mr. Robert J. Walker, in his inaugural address as Governor of Kansas, speaking of the Lecompton convention, says:

"That convention is now about to be elected by you, under the call of the Territorial Legislature created, and still recognized by the authority of Congress, and clothed by it, in the comprehensive language of the organic law, with full power to make such an enactment. The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, were fully sustained by the act of Congress."

Again, he says:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate, freely and fairly, in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage; but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of voting authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency; and the absentees are as much bound, under the law and Constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as though all had participated in the election."

It is true that the distinguished author of the bill denies that it confers any such power. And yet the very ground upon which he rests his opposition to the admission of Kansas seems to break the moral force of this denial. His position is, that the Kansas bill intended that the constitution, when adopted, should be submitted to a direct vote of the people; that this was its intent and meaning. Now, sir, if the bill went so far as to prescribe the mode of adopting the constitution, it certainly contemplated the framing of it. A constitution cannot be submitted to the people until it is formed.

Having demonstrated that this convention, assembled to form the constitution, possessed every attribute heretofore regarded requisite to complete the work effectually, it is objected that before it can present a valid title to this Congress, it should be first submitted, for adoption or rejection, to the people; not to the people whose delegates framed it, but to them and such settlers as may have come into the Territory during its progress to completion! In order to show how empty and ridiculous are the pretexes for rejecting Kansas, I propose to give this argument in the language of its author. Speaking of what the President says of the convention at Lecompton, the distinguished gentleman to whom I refer, [Mr. DOUGLAS], says:

"The President does not say, he does not mean that this convention had ever been recognized by the Congress of the United States as legal or valid. On the contrary, he knows, as we here know, that during the last Congress I reported a bill from the Committee on Territories to authorize the people of Kansas to assemble and form a constitution for themselves. Subsequently, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] brought forward a substitute for my bill, which, after having been modified by him and myself in consultation, was passed by the Senate. It is known in the country as 'the Toombs bill.' It authorized the people of Kansas Territory to assemble in convention and form a constitution preparatory to their admission into the Union as a State. That bill, it is well known, was defeated in the House of Representatives. It matters not, for the purpose of this argument, what was the reason of its defeat. Whether the reason was a political one; whether it had reference to the then existing contest for the Presidency; whether it was to keep open the slavery question; whether it was a conviction that the bill would not be fairly carried out; whether it was because there were not people enough in Kansas to justify the formation of a State; no matter what the reason was, the House of Representatives refused to pass that bill, and thus denied to the people of Kansas the right to form a constitution and State government at this time."

Proceeding then to discuss the power of the Territorial Legislature to call a convention, he concludes as follows:

"If you apply these principles to the Kansas convention, you find that it had no power to do any act as a convention forming a government; you find that the act calling it was null and void from the beginning; you find that the Legislature could confer no power whatever on the convention."

Upon a subsequent occasion, defending his position, he says, as follows:

"In other words, I contended that a convention, constituted in obedience to an enabling act of Congress previously giving assent, is a constitutional body of men, with power and authority to institute government; but that a convention assembled under an act of the Territorial Legislature, without the assent of Congress previously given, has no authority to institute government."

"This was my position in regard to the effect of an enabling act. I then went on to show that, there having been no enabling act passed for Kansas, the Lecompton convention was irregular."

It is rather late in the day for this gentleman to begin to rectify such irregularities. We need go no further back than California. She was begotten by a military general, and forced into the family of States by the Casarean operation of an executive accoucheur. [Laughter.] Yes, sir, without any previous assent of Congress, without even the authority of a Territorial Legislature; without any census; a land of roaming adventurers was lugged into the Union over all law and precedent, as the coequal of the oldest State of this Union, because it happened to be a free State. What then said this stickler for enabling acts and ratified constitutions? How spoke the putative father of these latter-day doctrines? Mr. DOUGLAS said, in 1850:

"I come now to consider California as a State. The question is now presented, whether we will receive her as one of the States of this Union; and, sir, why should we not do it? The proceedings, it is said, in the formation of her constitution and State government have been irregular. If this be so, whose fault is it? Not the people of California, for you have refused, for the period of two years, to pass a law in pursuance of which the proceedings would have been regular. Surely, you will not punish the people of California for your own sins—sins of omission as well as of commission."

"It will be recollected by every Senator present—I trust the fact will not be forgotten—that more than one year ago, I brought in a bill to authorize the people of California to form a State constitution, and to come into the Union. Had that bill passed, the proceedings would have been regular."

"Well, the bill was defeated, and the people of California, acting upon these suggestions, and relying upon the precedents cited, have formed a constitution and presented themselves for admission. Now they are to be told that they cannot be received, because Congress failed to pass a law, and the proceedings are irregular without it. I do not precisely understand what is meant by the irregularity of these proceedings. I have examined the precedents in all the cases in which new States have been admitted into the Union, from Vermont to Wisconsin. I will not go over them in detail," &c. "Those precedents show that there is no established rule upon the subject. There are several cases in which there have been no previous assent of Congress, no census taken, no qualifications for voters prescribed. There is no rule, and consequently can be no irregularity."

"I hold that the people of California had a right to do what they have done—yes, they had a moral, political, and legal right to do all they have done."

How different is his language to Kansas! The very refusal of Congress to pass an enabling act for California is urged as a justification of her monstrous proceedings, and is presented as her strongest title to admission. But when Kansas applies, the same action by Congress is relied upon as an insurmountable obstacle to her admission. The California convention had the perfect right, moral, legal, and political, to do what they have done. But the Kansas convention, although acting under an act of Congress which pledged the faith of the nation to her admission as a State, acting under a regular and legal call of her people, every safeguard provided, is held to have no power to do any act as a convention forming a government; that the act calling it was null and void from the beginning, and that Congress, in refusing to pass an enabling act, (no matter what the motive,) denied to the people the right to form a constitution and State government.

Sir, how are we to reconcile such glaring inconsistency? There is but one solution, and every day is riveting it in the southern mind; and that is, where a State applies for admission with a constitution excluding slavery, no irregularity can be too enormous, no violation of precedent too marked, no disregard of constitutional procedure too palpable, no outrage can be too enormous for its admission as a State into the Union; but when a State applies for admission with slavery in its constitution, no excuse can be too trivial, no pretense too paltry and ignoble, to keep her out. Sir, the direct tendency, and with some the avowed object, of all this opposition, is to delay the admission of Kansas until she becomes a free State. Why do they pursue this course? It is but an offshoot of that damnable policy which has been preying upon the vitals of the South for the last forty years—that of buying peace for the turbulent and fanatical at the expense of the quiet and orderly. When Missouri applies for admission, Abolitionism gets up an excitement about slave territory. For peace sake Congress overleaps the Constitution, and marks out a line beyond which slavery shall not go. Abolitionism raves to be heard in Congress about slavery generally, and for the sake of peace Congress allows it to fill the Capitol with Abolition petitions which it has no power on earth to grant. Abolitionism hires armed bands to go and drive slaveholders out of Kansas, and Robert J. Walker, for peace sake, would hand it over to them. To pacify a band of rebels, reeking with the blood of southern men, women, and children, to whom he is indebted for all he is, he turns against his benefactors, he violates his pledge, abuses his trust, disgraces his office, truckles to the vile, tramples on the just, and scatters the firebrand of discord throughout Kansas, the Union, and the Capitol. And STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, who was for lassoing California and dragging her into the Union over all law and precedent, and the violated rights of fifteen of the sovereign States of this Union, would now subject Kansas to all the rigors of the Inquisition to keep her out of the Union.

But we are told that it is a contempt of the authority of the people of Kansas—that it is an inroad upon popular sovereignty to withhold from them a revision of their constitution. Sir, the authority of the people is fully recognized; popular sovereignty, as a principle, is fully enforced when an opportunity is afforded to the legal voters to deposit their votes for delegates to a convention. Are not those delegates the people's representatives? Is there a lawyer present who would teach his client that the acts of an authorized agent are invalid if not submitted for ratification to the principal? Would he tell them that such acts unsubmitted would be insulting to the principal's dignity, or intrusive upon his prerogatives? Would you say that no respect should be paid to the acts, or to the principal himself, if he suffered them to go forth as his own, unratified? The truth lies just in the opposite direction. "The right of electing delegates to a convention," in the language of the profoundest writer on the philosophy of government, "places the powers of the Government as fully in the mass of the community, as they would be had they assembled, made, and executed the laws themselves without the intervention of agents or representatives."

The people act in their sovereign capacity when they elect delegates; and the delegates thus elected, and convened, are, for all practical purposes, identical with the people. Sir, I take higher grounds. I hold that the highest embodiment of sovereignty, the most imposing political assemblage known to our constitution and laws, is a convention of the people legally assembled, not en masse, for such an assemblage is unknown in our representative system, but by their delegates, legally elected. When such a body, with no declared limitation upon their powers, are deputed to form a constitution, and they execute their trust, the constitution, ipso facto, becomes the supreme law of the land, unquestionable and unchangeable by any power on earth, save that which ordained it. This is no novel doctrine. It has the sanction of the wisest and greatest men known to American history. Mr. Calhoun, speaking of a convention of the people, says it implied "a meeting of the people, either by themselves or by delegates chosen for the purpose in their high sovereign character. It is, in a word, a meeting of the people in the majesty of their power—in that in which they may rightfully make or abolish constitutions, and put up and down governments, at their pleasure." (Calhoun's Works, vol. 2, page 612.) Our present Chief Magistrate, in standing by the action of the Lecompton constitution, is only acting in accordance with his opinions long since recorded. In the debate on the veto power, he said:

"The Senator [Mr. CLAY] asks, why has not the veto been given to the President on acts of conventions held for the purpose of amending our constitutions? If it be necessary to restrain Congress, it is equally necessary to restrain conventions. The answer to this argument is equally easy. It would be absurd to grant an appeal through the intervention of the veto to the people themselves against their own acts. They create conventions by virtue of their own undelimited and inalienable sovereignty; and when they speak, their servants, whether legislative, judicial, or executive, must be silent."

Such was the convention of Lecompton, and the constitution it presents was established under laws, Federal and territorial, to which every man in Kansas (except rebels) has given his consent. These laws direct the election, prescribe the order of it, the qualification of voters, and the times of holding the meeting, and the duties and qualifications of the presiding officer. In this way the delegates were elected. They met; and upon mature deliberation framed a constitution—a constitution republican in form, and securing to the people of Kansas all those great institutions of freedom which have ever been regarded as the only and surest bulwarks of civil liberty. Violating no law, inconsistent with no principle of the Federal Constitution, it preserves and guarantees to the people of Kansas all the great agencies of freedom, the right of habeas corpus, trial by jury, freedom of the press and speech, and liberty of conscience, as inviolate and pure as when they were first given to us, baptized in the blood of our revolutionary fathers. Now, sir, can a greater insult be offered to the understanding of the American people than to say that a constitution thus established would gain anything of credit or sanctity by a ratification like that contended for? I grant that the people, through the legislature, may reserve to themselves the right of ratification, or the delegates may recognize it in the constitution itself; and in either case a ratification would become necessary to the validity of the instrument; but without those terms it would become absolute as soon as sanctioned by the delegates.

I go further. I boldly maintain that wisdom, prudence, and policy demand that the delegates should be entirely untrammelled in framing the fundamental law. The people in mass cannot deliberate upon a constitution, adopt what is good, and amend what is faulty in it. They must adopt or reject it, in the entire; and thus, on account of objections to a single clause, they might reject the most admirable constitution ever devised by the wisdom of man. The radical error which underlies the whole argument of these gentlemen is this: they assume that there is a general agreement of opinion, a collective sentiment of the people, as a unit, as to what shall be the principles and provisions of their fundamental law, and that this common sentiment is to be ascertained only by a direct vote of the people. And yet, sir, such a course might result in a grave and capital delusion. If a method could be devised for collecting the opinion of each citizen upon each clause of a constitution, the diversities of sentiment would be equal to the number of voters, and, perhaps, greater. The theory of ratification, however, does not allow to the people the right of framing a constitution, or even offering amendments and modifications. They can only, like a witness on cross-examination, answer "yea" or "nay." And I repeat, a constitution which might stand an imperishable monument of human wisdom, could be voted down by an immense majority, of which each individual member might be in an actual minority on the particular subject-matter of his dissent. Such a process, so far from evoking the general pervading sentiment of a people as to what shall be their fundamental law, may signally fail in eliciting the true view of a single individual.

A distinguished Senator has laid down the proposition that, under the power to admit new States Congress is forced by a paramount duty to see that the constitution of a State asking admission into the Union embodies the will of the majority of the people. Sir, I hold that a constitution presented by the regular and legally constituted authority is conclusive upon Congress as to the will of a people. We will not allow any such issue to be presented. We assert the right of the people to form their Government; but we hold, and I think I have already shown, that the highest and purest exhibition of their sovereign will is a people acting by their own chosen delegates in convention assembled. The Federal Government, and half of the States of this Union, were formed in this way, and they need no improvement from the constitutional tinkering of this day.

To object that the convention may have abused its powers, and that the constitution should be submitted to a direct popular vote, in order that it may be ascertained whether it accords with the will of the people, is to beg the question, and to strike at the very root of all constitutional and legal authority. It is an objection not to the constitution of Kansas alone, but to the very genius and framework of all representative government. Upon the same ground that a constitution framed by delegates should be submitted to the people, it may also be demonstrated that every law enacted by Congress, or by a legislature, and that every verdict by a jury, or decision of a court, should likewise be submitted for the approval of the people. Sir, a delegate may misrepresent the people, a Senator or Representative may misrepresent his constituents, but the remedy does not lie here in this central power of the Republic, (more liable to abuse than any other,) it lies in the hands of the local constituency, to whom the representatives are immediately responsible. And here lies the efficacy and power of our form of Government. The direct responsibility of our rulers to their constituents, the right of suffrage among the people, aided by that great moral engine of freedom, the liberty of the press, are the vis medicatrix nature of our political system, sufficient to remedy every disorder and throw off every impurity, without resorting to violent irregularity and revolutionary action.

When a State applies for admission, Congress is bound to subject her to no restrictions except such as Congress may constitutionally impose upon the States already composing the Union. There is but one limitation which you are bound to impose, and that is, that her form of government should be republican. But, under the power to guaranty a republican form of government, you have not the right to range with unlimited discretion through every provision of her constitution, interfere with her internal and local distribution of political power, adjust questions of majority and minority, lay down arbitrary rules of your own as to what constitutes republican government, and, by compelling her to conform to them, substitute the will of Congress for hers as to what shall be her fundamental law. Are not the constitutions of the original thirteen States pretty fair tests as to what constitutes republican government? Can any one say that the Kansas constitution, tried by this test, the only one which you can rightfully apply, is not a republican form of government? Where is the feature in it contrary to our republican institutions, or repugnant to the paramount Constitution of the Union?

We are told by a distinguished gentleman that he would "pass over forms, ceremonies, and organizations, to get down deep to the will of the people." Sir, the will of the people can only be obtained through these forms, ceremonies, and organizations; and the structure of our Government is intended to provide these forms and organizations, through which the people can speak authentically and authoritatively. What can he mean by passing over and disregarding these forms? The Constitution of the United States is a form. Times, places, and manner of holding elections, and qualifications of franchise, are but forms, through which the people exercise their power. This matchless Government, springing from the Constitution and the division of power between the Federal and State Governments, is but an organization. Would he pass over all these to get down to what he sees proper to consider the will of the people? The doctrine is monstrous, dangerous, and disorganizing. It gives to the action of regular government no more authority than belongs to an ordinary, voluntary assemblage of citizens, outside of the Constitution and law. If these views be correct, we had better, at once, tear down this splendid fabric of American architecture, and discard conventions, Legislatures, and Congresses, as inconvenient, cumbrous superfluities, and resort at once to the democratic absolutism of Athens. The doctrine has been in Europe omnipotent for pulling down forms, ceremonies, and organizations, but powerless for reconstruction; like those serpents in the East, which, while they inflict a death-blow, breathe out their own life in the wound of their dying victim.

We were told by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] that the constitution is not republican in form, because it prohibits amendment, alteration, or change, until after 1864, and then hampers the perfectly free action of the people by requiring a majority of two thirds of the Legislature to concur before they will allow the majority to call for amendment. But the climax of anti-republicanism is the provision that "no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves;" a doctrine that would tumble into irretrievable ruin the Federal Constitution, and the constitutions of half the States in the Union, including that of the gentleman's own State; for there is not one of these which does not contain as stringent and dilatory limitations as are found in this Kansas constitution. The argument by which he supports this view is, that the "Democracy, as taught in Ohio, believes in the repeatability of everything by the popular voice." Do the Democracy of Ohio consider the clauses of the Constitution securing all those great rights, such as freedom of speech, freedom of the press, liberty of conscience, inviolability of property, repealable by the popular will? Do the Democracy of Ohio believe in the repeatability of that clause guarantying the right of a State to equality of representation in the Senate of the United States? This may be Democracy in Ohio; but I hope it is a Democracy confined to Ohio alone. It may be Republicanism, but it is not the constitutional republicanism of America; it is the red republicanism of France. The very tenure by which the gentleman exercises the privilege of uttering these objections against the Kansas constitution, is an oath to support a Constitution liable to them all; a Constitution imposing the heaviest restrictions on the power of amendment; a Constitution whose framers intended it, not as an instrument of power, but as an instrument of protection against power.

It would be well for these gentlemen to consider when, and by whom, this particular mode of adopting a constitution, which they insist is the only true mode, was first established. It was not by the fathers of this Republic—the men of 1776. The Federal Constitution was not submitted for adoption to a direct vote of the people, nor were the constitutions of the Old Thirteen. The first instance in modern times, so far as my researches go, was the constitution of 1799, which was submitted to the people of France, and accepted by a vote of three million to fifteen hundred. This was in accordance with the teachings of Rousseau—the doctrine of unlimited, indivisible, undelimited power of the people—a doctrine almost identical in terms to that upon which the opposition to the admission of Kansas rests. What was the result? The sovereignty of the people was established and recognized, the King was beheaded, the nobility were banished, the religion abolished, property confiscated, and France converted into one moral and political volcano, from the conflict of whose discordant elements arose the demon of centralization and military despotism, the rod of whose power smote down all the valuable rights of the people, and the cherished interests of humanity. It was during the progress of this fanatical and bloody drama, that one of its most conspicuous and sanguinary actors, appalled by the magnitude of the power which he had invoked, exclaimed: "Do you not see the project of appeal to the people tends but to destroy the representative body? It is sporting with the sovereign majesty of the people, to return to it a work which it charges you to terminate promptly."

The next constitution submitted to the people was the consulate constitution, confirming upon Napoleon Bonaparte—[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise not for the purpose of indulging in declamation, but simply to discuss, in a legal manner, the points which have been in controversy before this committee. The venerable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] distinguished alike for his military glory and his ability as a statesman, has assumed the position upon this floor, that the law of nations does not prevent our citizens from banding themselves together to invade the territories of other nations with which we are at peace. From that position I entirely dissent. He also contends that the Constitution of the United States does not grant to Congress any power whatever to pass a law to prevent our citizens from these aggressions. From this I also dissent. I enter my protest against both these positions. They are not correct. It is a strange doctrine for a statesman to advocate, that when we have concluded a treaty of peace with another nation, that treaty is binding only on our Government, and not upon our people; that the treaty of peace amounts only to a compact which binds the powers of this Government, but not the powers of the people. I maintain that the true doctrine is, that when our Government is at peace with a nation, every citizen is also at peace with that nation; that what the nation cannot do, no citizen can do.

The Government of the United States cannot invade the territories of that nation, nor can any citizen of this Government invade them. The treaty of peace is as broad as the nation, and embraces every individual in it; and not only every citizen, but every resident of the country is bound by that treaty of peace. Nobody has any more right to violate it than the nation itself.

The gentleman says that the Government has no right to interfere in the case of individuals who go from one country to attack another nation. I deny it. I say that this nation is bound for every individual in it who attempts acts of hostility against a nation with which we are at peace. If a man in Canada should arm himself, and pass into our border with the intention of attacking our countrymen and violating the peace of the land, it would be as much the duty of the authorities of Canada to interfere as if that man had arrayed around him a thousand men, armed like himself. We are bound for the act of every citizen within our limits. Every individual within our limits is bound by our treaties of peace; and when we are at peace with a nation, every individual under the Government is also at peace with it. No one has rights as an individual which we have not as a nation; and we have none as a nation which do not belong to each one as an individual.

It would be a monstrous and dangerous doctrine, indeed, to promulgate in this Union, that when we are at peace with another nation, our citizens can band themselves together to attack that nation notwithstanding the treaty of peace. It would be a monstrous doctrine to teach that one man, or twenty men, or ten thousand men, or the vast millions who people our extended domains, can arm themselves, with the gentleman as their leader, if you please, and march in a body to attack a neighboring nation with which we have a treaty of peace. I care not, however, whether there is a treaty of peace existing between us and that nation or not; it matters nothing in the argument. Peace is the natural condition of a nation; it is the natural relation which one nation bears to another, and war is the unnatural condition. And whether there is a treaty or not, still our citizens have not the right, unless there is a declaration of war, to march armed bands into another country to violate its laws and make war upon its citizens.

Mr. QUITMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me for a moment to state that I took no such position. I contend simply for this position: that it is no violation, where there is peace between two nations, for an individual, or for a number of individuals, to commit hostility against the individuals of the other nation—not against the nation itself. And I ask the gentleman if he recognizes the authority of Vattel, one of the ablest writers on the law of nations? He says, book 3, chap. 7, sec. 110:

"The quarrels of another cannot deprive me of the free disposition of my rights in the pursuit of measures which I judge advantageous to my country. Therefore, when it is a custom in a nation, in order for employing and exercising its subjects, to permit levies of troops in favor of a Power in whom it is pleased to confide, the enemy of this Power cannot call these permissions hostilities."

"He cannot even claim, with any right, that the like should be granted him," &c. "The Switzers grant levies of troops to whom they please, and nobody has thought proper to quarrel with them on this head."

Mr. MONTGOMERY. In reply to the gentleman from Mississippi, I beg leave to read further from the same book. The only difference between us is, that the gentleman did not read far enough upon the page. If he had read far enough he would have found the doctrine I was contending for, and that the law of nations does not sustain the position he assumes. He says:

"Sec. 72. But, on the other hand, the nation or the sovereign ought not to suffer the citizens to do an injury to the subjects of another State, much less to offend that State itself; and this, not only because no sovereign ought to permit those who are under his command to violate the precepts of the law of nature, which forbids all injuries,—but also because nations ought mutually to respect each other, to abstain from all offense, from all injury, from all wrong,—in a word, from everything that may be of prejudice to others. If a sovereign, who might keep his subjects within the rules of justice and peace, suffers them to injure a foreign nation, either in its body or its members, he does no less injury to that nation than if he injured it himself. In short, the safety of the State, and that of human society, requires this attention from every sovereign. If you let loose the reins to your subjects against foreign nations, these will behave in the same manner to you; and, instead of that friendly intercourse which nature has established between all men, we shall see nothing but one vast and dreadful scene of plunder between nation and nation."

I adopt the language of the learned writer of the law of nations as my reply to the gentleman from Mississippi. Now, sir, we have the law of nations upon the subject. That being the position we occupy towards Nicaragua, the question arises, what rights and powers have other nations which are not guaranteed to us by our Constitution? Is it possible, as is contended for, that this mighty nation is an exception to all other nations on the globe, and has not the constitutional power to enforce the law of nations? Is it possible that American citizens can stand upon the floor of Congress, and maintain that we are not compelled to sustain the law of nations, the obligations of good faith, and to enforce our treaty stipulations with other nations? Is that the position which is assumed here; and is that the position occupied by the gentleman from Mississippi? I do not think that is exactly it. I do not think he would go that far. Having established what the law of nations provides for, and guards against, then the question arises, what rights we have, and what obligations we are under. What power have these United States to guard against the infraction of the law of nations? It is hardly worth while to refer members to the Constitution of the United States; but as it was denied that we had any constitutional power upon the subject, perhaps it is best to read from that instrument. One of the provisions of the eighth section of the Constitution of the United States is:

"Congress shall have power to define and punish piracies and felonies committed upon the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations."

Everything that is an offense against the law of nations can be provided for and guarded against by a law of Congress. The power given to Congress is as broad as the law of nations; the whole subject is under their control. Did they exercise it by the passage of the act of 1818? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] contended that they did not. He contended that no act had been passed by the Congress of the United States that would authorize us to make an arrest beyond a marine league from our own shores. Mark the extent of it. The law of nations requires that we shall restrain our citizens from committing aggressions against other States. The Constitution of the United States provides that we shall have all the power to enforce the law of nations, and that Congress can enact a law for that purpose. Congress, in obedience to these requirements of the Constitution, and to carry out and enforce the law of nations, passed the act of 1818. One of the plainest rules of interpreting a statute, is to know the object of the law-making power in enacting a particular law. If we know the motives which prompted the legislation, we can easily interpret the law.

The object which the Congress of the United States had in view when they enacted the statute of 1818, was to carry out the law of nations; and yet, according to the argument of the other side, they did not do it. They did not do what they intended. I say that such an interpretation is an unfair and an unnatural one. It would not be the interpretation given by the Congress which passed that law. They intended to guard against every infraction of the law of nations by our citizens; they intended to guard against expeditions being fitted out in the United States for the purpose of carrying war into countries with which we were at peace. I maintain that the interpretations given to these two sections of the law are forced and unnatural. It is not the legitimate construction which should be given to them. The law is divisible into two parts. The first section provides against expeditions being fitted out within our own boundaries. Section six reads:

"That if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are [at] peace, every person, so offending, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $3,000, and imprisoned not more than three years."

That was intended by Congress to guard against expeditions being fitted out within our own country. It was intended to guard against the banding together of a body of men for the purpose of invading the territories of, and waging war against, nations with which we were at peace.

There is a further section. If Congress had stopped at the sixth section there might be some doubt about the matter. I here beg leave, however, to explain what is meant by the marine league about which so much has been said in this debate. In every civilized nation the sea, within a marine league of shore, is recognized in law as land. Offenses committed within a marine league of shore are regarded as offenses, in every sense of the word, committed upon land. If a man commits murder within a marine league, he is tried as though it had been committed upon the shore. An offense committed anywhere, within the marine league, is committed on land, and the offender can be tried according to the provisions of the sixth section of the act of 1818.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would ask the gentleman this question: If the doctrine which he now maintains be correct, what was the necessity for the sixth section?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. You state that the jurisdiction of the United States extends to one marine league, and that offenses committed within that marine league are the same as offenses committed on the land.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then, what was the necessity for this sixth section of the act of 1818?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. It is a mere affirmation of the common law—a mere affirmation of what is acknowledged everywhere; inserted, doubtless, to prevent any doubt as to the jurisdiction of our courts.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to remind him that, according to the principles of statutory construction, the law-maker is never to be presumed as doing an idle or vain thing?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. This was not a vain thing. Here is a provision enacted for the purpose of fixing the jurisdiction of courts, and of punishing certain offenses committed within that jurisdiction. But the jurisdiction itself is another matter. To prevent doubt as to the extent of jurisdiction possessed by the court, the common law is affirmed by the statute. To what offenses does this sixth section of the act extend? Why, it extends to all offenses committed within the limits of our country, or within a marine league of the shore. This was the common law; and this section of the act is but in affirmation of that. It provides, "if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States," &c. Then the question of jurisdiction over offenses arises. This section of the statute settles the question; for the section of the law clearly embraces every offense committed within a marine league of shore. But the next section was made for the specific purpose of going beyond the mere limits of this land jurisdiction—of going somewhere else, and of doing something else. It provides that in every case in which a vessel shall be fitted out and armed, &c., then the President of the United States shall have power to do so and so. In the former case the jurisdiction was in the court, but this eighth section vests the power in the President. It provides, after specifying the offenses embraced in it, as follows:

"In every such case it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, for the purpose of detaining any such ship or vessel, with its prize or prizes. And also, for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States against the territories or dominion of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with which the United States are at peace."

"Carrying on!" The one is to prevent such an expedition from being equipped, armed, and organized, and the other is for the purpose of preventing it from being "carried on." What is the meaning of the phrase "carried on"? Is its application confined to within the marine league? Or does it extend from our shores to the place where the conflict of war is taking place? I ask you whether such an expedition is not being "carried on" when the contending armies are actually in sight of each other and ranged in battle array, and even when they are actually engaged in conflict? I ask whether the Army and Navy of the country cannot just as well arrest the offenders there, for the purpose of preventing them from "carrying on" the expedition as they can within a marine league of the shore? If we cannot prevent the expedition from being carried on wherever we find it, then the language of the act is too broad; and if Commodore Paulding pursued the words of the act, the fault is in the law, and not in that noble American sailor.

The next question that arises is this: Has "General" Walker committed any offense against the law of nations? No man will stand on this floor and deny that he went with an armed force into a country with which this country was at peace; that he went into Nicaragua with a body of soldiers, with arms in their hands. The papers show that he signs his name as commander-in-chief of the army—not as an agricultural emigrant, not as a peaceful man going to settle in the country, to till the soil, and to live there in peace under the laws as they stand. On the contrary, he styles himself commander-in-chief of the army of Nicaragua. He goes in hostile array to wage war against that country. He goes as a military usurper to overturn the civil institutions of the country by the force of arms, and to hold it by conquest. This is his offense against the law of nations, and the laws of our country.

Then the question arises as to the legality of his arrest. I maintain that this is the doctrine of the law, and that no man can controvert it: that the right of a nation to arrest a criminal who has committed an offense against its laws is always perfect; that it exists everywhere; and that you can arrest that criminal wherever he is found, any where on the broad earth. But that right of arrest is subject to a limit. What is the limit? In certain cases—mark, I do not say in all cases, but in certain cases—the right of arrest is in subordination to the sovereignty of the country where the arrest is made. A criminal escapes from this country to England. The sovereignty of England may interpose to prevent his arrest; but between the criminal and the country our right to arrest him is as perfect as it ever was—just as perfect as it would be in the streets of Washington, or in the city of New York. It is the same in London. It is the same in Pekin. We never lose that right of arrest; we cannot lose it, in any shape, unless we relinquish it.

But I said that, in certain cases, it was in subordination to the right of the nation where the arrest is made. It is so whenever the sovereignty of that nation will protect the criminal. Our right to arrest a criminal being a perfect right, subsisting everywhere, wherever a criminal is found, whether on the high seas, in the territory of England, or in the territory of Nicaragua, it follows that General Walker can be arrested, unless the sovereignty of the nation where he is found protects him. Let me illustrate; let me prove it beyond peradventure; and I defy gentlemen to disprove my position. On what principle do all our extradition treaties proceed? They proceed upon the principle that the right of arrest is perfect everywhere; that Governments have the right to arrest a criminal wherever he is found, subject only to the limitation of the sovereignty of that nation; and all that is attained by extradition treaties is simply the consent of the nation to lift up that sovereignty, and permit the arrest. That is all. Such treaties are everywhere acknowledged as legal and proper, and this proves most incontestably that the right of arrest exists everywhere. A man escapes from England to this country, and, under the extradition treaty that exists between us, he is arrested and taken back: does that violate any right on the part of the criminal? Not at all. He never had any. The right of England to have a criminal arrested here for an offense committed within her borders, is a perfect right; and the treaty did not make it any more perfect.

It was only for the time being in subordination to the sovereignty of our country; and that sovereignty being withdrawn, the arrest, in such circumstances, is a complete and legal arrest, and no defense could be set up against it in any court. Then the question arises, when does the sovereignty of a nation protect a refugee? When is a criminal shielded from arrest by the sovereignty of the nation in which he has taken refuge? When he goes into a country to attack the sovereignty of such nation, then the sovereignty of the nation will not protect him. If General Walker committed an offense against the laws of his country, and then went into the territory of Nicaragua in defiance of her laws, there is no man on earth who would pretend to say that the laws of Nicaragua would shield the man who comes to attack and destroy those very laws. That would be a monstrous exercise of sovereignty—a sovereignty throwing the shield of protection around the villain who was stabbing it to the heart! Think of a man setting up as his defense from arrest the protection of a Government which he was laboring to destroy. The man who was aiming to blot out the nationality of Nicaragua claims that this nationality protects him. That is not the object of national sovereignty, and it is a strange perversion of terms to claim such an office for it. No nation ever throws the shield of protection over a man who comes to attack and destroy it.

Let me illustrate further. The law of nations makes it our duty to prevent our citizens from committing acts of hostility against nations with which we are at peace. We are bound to perform that duty, wherever the offenders may be found. The arrest must be made, the warfare must be stopped, whether those who engage in it be found on the high seas, in our own country, or in the country against which the war is being carried on. We are bound to do it, for it is our duty. Let me illustrate by a familiar example. I am passing by the house of a neighbor, when I hear the cry of murder and help from within; I go to the door and find it locked; I seize a sledge and break in the door and arrive just in time to clutch the assassin's arm as he is about to strike my neighbor to the heart: I ask you if there is a man here who would contend that I have violated the right of sovereignty of my neighbor by entering his castle for his protection, or that he could sustain a suit against me for the act? Sir, I broke into his "castle" for the purpose of rendering him the assistance which he requested by his cries for help.

But, sir, our duty under the law of nations is stronger even than that. I was not bound to break into my neighbor's house to save his life. It was my duty to do it, but it was a moral duty which I was not bound to perform; but, under the laws of nations, it is not only proper that we should arrest an expedition fitted out from our shores to invade the territories of a nation with which we are at peace, but it is a duty which we are bound to perform. Under the law of nations, and under our own laws, we have no option in the performance of this duty. We are bound, as a matter of necessity, to arrest the man, and prevent our people from committing outrages upon a neighboring nation. It is a duty of which we cannot divest ourselves unless we violate the law.

Will any one contend that the sovereignty of Nicaragua shielded General Walker whilst he attacked it, or that we invaded that sovereignty in arresting him? Sir, it would be an anomalous, a monstrous proposition, precisely on a par with that of the man who, because I entered his house when I heard the cry of murder, would attempt to make me amenable to the civil law.

I say, sir, that we had a duty to perform under the law of nations, and under the law of 1818; and that in the discharge of that duty, we must prevent the "carrying on" of the expedition of General Walker. In the discharge of this duty, we were bound to follow that expedition and break it up wherever found; and no man can set up a claim upon the part of Nicaragua for an invasion of her soil. If such a claim were presented in this House, it would be scouted by every man upon this floor, because we all know that such a claim would be groundless.

I maintain, sir, that Commodore Paulding has violated no law, committed no offense, but that he simply performed his duty. And I honor him for it. I respect his intentions; I admire his boldness and firmness; and I approve of his conduct, and fearlessly pronounce his interpretation of the law under which he acted as unquestionably correct. I love the noble tar who braved the consequences, and "took the responsibility" of doing his duty.

Gentlemen, to defend General Walker, have dragged in the invasion of the soil of Nicaragua as an outrage committed by our country. To hear them, one would suppose they were Nicaraguans, and not citizens of our glorious land. From their representations, we would be led to believe that the poor people of Central America were in tears because we rescued them from the ravages of a merciless invader.

But, sir, did Commodore Paulding, by the arrest of General Walker, violate the law of nations? I say that he did simply his duty, and nothing more than his duty; and that if he had done less he would have been censurable. It is the duty of our Government to restrain and prevent its citizens, wherever found, in the language of the act of 1818, from "carrying on" such expeditions. Suppose an army of our people should be organized to cross the imaginary line on the northwestern boundary of our country and attack the people of Nova Scotia; suppose we send our army to arrest the expedition, but just as it reached the boundary line, the expedition, ten thousand strong, crossed over, and in full sight of our army commenced the work of burning houses and robbing and slaughtering the citizens of that country: I ask if there is any man here who would justify a commander-in-chief if he would not pass over the line and put a stop to this work of murder and arson? I think there is no man here who would not say he was right in crossing the line. Yet if the interpretation of the act of 1818 is as contended for by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, he should have allowed the slaughter to have proceeded without interruption, because the act of 1818, although it required us to prevent the carrying on of such expeditions from our own shores, did not permit us to enter the jurisdiction of another Power for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I think Commodore Paulding was entirely right in the construction which he gave to the act of 1818, and I think he is entitled to much credit for the interpretation he gave to that act of Congress. I think the Congress of the United States should concur in that interpretation, for it is the correct one. It is a safe doctrine, and the only doctrine under which it is practicable to restrain such expeditions. Under any other construction it would be almost impossible to arrest an expedition fitted out on our southern borders to attack a neighboring country, because you can never find the ship, in one time out of a thousand, until the men and munitions of war are landed. It was so in the case of the expedition fitted out against Cuba. We had a line of ships upon our coast, and Spain had almost covered the ocean with her ships of war. Yet the expedition was not overtaken until it had landed, and the army had gone into the interior, and there fought as Americans will fight, until the last man died, or was taken prisoner.

Under such an interpretation you render your act impotent. You can neither enforce the laws of nations nor carry out the provisions of the act of 1818, unless you sustain the very course which has been taken by Commodore Paulding. We should not give it the cold support that says, "You ought not, perhaps, to have passed the borders; that was technically wrong, but you have acted under an honest mistake, and we will excuse you." Let us on the contrary say, "Commodore, you have done your duty, and we will sustain you." At the time of the Canadian difficulties the authorities there gave this interpretation to the law of nations. General Brady took his position upon the waters which divide the United States and Canada, and there prevented the expedition from our country from going over. Why did not the United States, which is so jealous of her right; why did not these gentlemen who stand up in this Hall in defense of the sovereignty of Nicaragua, call upon England to redress this grievous invasion of our waters? This, sir, is a novel doctrine, one which has sprung up in favor of General Walker; such a doctrine as has had no recognition in the practice of nations; such as has found no place in the pages of the learned writers on international laws.

It is contended gravely that we should send Walker back; that we have committed a gross outrage upon his rights, and that we ought to put him on board one of the vessels of our Navy, with his men and munitions of war, send him back, and put him precisely where Commodore Paulding found him. Yet the men who contend thus, in the same breath allege, that when Commodore Paulding landed upon the shores of Nicaragua, he committed an outrage upon the sovereignty of that State; and yet they would send him back, with his men and his arms, and thus commit another outrage upon the sovereignty of that nation. This is to be done; and upon the principle, it is to be supposed, that two wrongs make one right. If it was an invasion for Commodore Paulding to land in Nicaragua to arrest General Walker and his troops, I should like to learn how, when General Walker is taken back, we can avoid again invading the sovereignty of Nicaragua. I hope that some of the honorable gentlemen who desire us to take General Walker back, will explain how, if Nicaraguan sovereignty was invaded in the one instance, they expect to avoid it in the other.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. What does the gentleman mean to do with the munitions of war taken from Walker? Does he mean to return them to Walker, to sell them, or to keep them for the purposes of our own Army?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. We do not want any of his plunder or his traps. We will give them back to him. But, Mr. Chairman, I, too, am in favor of sending General Walker back. I maintain that it is our duty to do so; and I think that the President of the United States, in the course he has pursued, committed one mistake, and that is that he did not go far enough. He has done his duty with too much generosity and mildness. He has been too forbearing. The law of nations required more from him. He ought to have done more than he has; he ought to have sent General Walker back; and, for one, I am prepared to vote for a resolution calling upon the President to have him arrested and sent back to Nicaragua. Yes, sir, it is our duty, under the law of nations, to send him back.

I am asked, why send him back? I will explain. It will not do for gentlemen to say that there must be a demand made by Nicaragua; nothing of that kind is required. I will let Mr. Vattel explain for himself the doctrine for which I contend. If General Walker has committed an outrage against the laws and the sovereignty of Nicaragua, he ought to be sent back, and it is the duty of this country to send him back, and there let this restless general be tried. The law of nations on this subject is thus. Vattel says (page 223, side number 75) that—"If the offended State keeps the guilty in his power, he may, without difficulty, punish him, and oblige him to make satisfaction. If the guilty escape and returns into his own country, justice may be demanded from his sovereign."

"And since this last ought not to suffer his subjects to molest the subjects of others, or to do them an injury, much less should he permit them audaciously to offend foreign powers; he ought to oblige the guilty to repair the damage, if that be possible; to inflict on him an exemplary punishment; or, in short, according to the nature of the case and the circumstances attending it, to deliver him up to the offended State, there to receive justice. This is pretty generally observed with respect to great crimes, or such as are equally contrary to the laws and SAFETY of ALL NATIONS."

It is the duty to deliver up the guilty party, and especially in this case, where the offense has been against the laws of nations. Three times has this General Walker invaded the territories, and waged a war of robbery and plunder upon nations with which we had treaties of peace binding us to restrain him and his followers from acts of aggression. Three times has he committed these outrages, in the face of the world, and in defiance of our treaties and our laws. The second time he was rescued through motives of sympathy and humanity, and brought back to our shores in a national ship. Then he was released upon his solemn parole of honor, by which he pledged himself to the Secretary of State that he would not commit another violation of the law of nations, or disturb the peace of Nicaragua. But again he has violated those laws and that solemn pledge; and in utter disregard of our laws, in contempt of our courts, and in violation of his recognizance, he has embarked with a small army of desperate men, and has invaded the territory of Nicaragua. Once more he has been arrested; and yet gentlemen claim for him our sympathies, and ask us to shield and protect him. Nay, more; that he may be permitted again to set our laws at defiance by another invasion of a country with which we are at peace. This desperate man, who insultingly and boastfully informs our Secretary of State that he intends again to return to conquer Nicaragua by forces assembled in our borders, finds advocates on this floor. I say that it was our duty, and it was the duty of the President, the moment General Walker was brought here, to have him placed in confinement in an American ship, and delivered up to Nicaragua, there to be tried for his violation of the peace of nations.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Let us understand what the gentleman means by the law of nations, and then we can understand his argument.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I mean by the law of nations, that rule of action which regulates the mutual intercourse of independent States with each other.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. How are they to be enforced?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Each nation must observe the laws of nations for itself, and prevent its citizens from violating them. They are to be enforced in precisely that way. Will the gentlemen on the other side complain of us for returning General Walker to Nicaragua? Why, sir, they have told us, with triumph written upon their countenances, that this man General Walker was the President of Nicaragua; that he was the ruler of that country; and that he has legal rights there. We were told by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] when I put the question to him, that Walker had been invited there by the Government of Nicaragua. If that be so, then General Walker has nothing to fear; his people will welcome back, with songs of rejoicing, their old friend, the commander of their forces, the President of their nation.

The friends of General Walker should not object to this. If his legal rights are there, he will have legal redress for his wrongs. If he has legal rights there, he can enforce them in the courts of Nicaragua. If, on the other hand, he has committed an outrage against the law of nations, if he has committed aggression upon the Territory of a neighboring nation, with which we are at peace, and the law makes it obligatory upon us, when a violation of the peace of a nation has been committed by any person who embarked from our shores, to deliver up the offender, we cannot escape from it. We have this thing to do, and we ought to do it; and I am ready here to vote for a resolution to have him delivered to the Government of Nicaragua. I trust this course will be taken.

The President of the United States has taken a vigorous stand upon this great question. He is to-day receiving the encomiums of the people of every Government in the civilized world for the course which he has adopted. We must either assume a bold, open, and independent opposition against these aggressions on sister States, or we will ere long be involved in a war for the violation of the peace of nations. It will not be a war with the feeble power of Nicaragua, but a war in which the Governments of the earth will be arrayed on one side and ourselves upon the other. Though I have no fear of the result of a conflict in which American valor is involved, who is willing to say that our glorious country has so lost its honor that the nations of the world are compelled to combine against it?

The aggressive spirit of our people has already been the subject of serious debate in the cabinets of London and Paris. Sustain the conduct of General Walker, and you will give such an impetus to the spirit of aggression and invasion, that no nation will be safe from attack. Mutual safety will require a union of the nations to check our insatiable and rapacious thirst for adventure. All the rest of Christendom on one side, and we on the other, fighting in an unjust cause, defeat is inevitable. It will not do for us to turn round and say to the nations of the Old World, "you have been equally guilty." This is a poor justification. The nations of Europe have had a watchful and guardian eye upon the shores of the Gulf of Mexico; and the day is not distant, unless the act of 1818 and the law of nations are enforced, when forbearance will cease to be a virtue, and resistance will become a duty; and then a fierce, long, and bloody war will be upon us. For what? For the aggrandizement of such men as General Walker. I say that the President of the United States is at the present time receiving eulogiums from every civilized Government upon earth, and his course is approved by the people of this country, almost unanimously. I am glad to see the returning spirit of reason.

Let us each and all be determined that we will stand by the President, that we will stand by the laws, and the dark clouds that now shade the horizon of the future will be entirely dispelled. Let us save our national honor by a manly and determined resistance to this spirit of aggression. Let us be able to turn proudly to the nations of the earth and say: "We respect our treaties; we enforce our laws; there is no blot on our national flag, no stain on our national honor."

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. This discussion has had a wide range, and the points involved in it have been elaborately discussed. I cannot hope to win and hold the attention of the House under such circumstances, and I will be brief and to the points I propose to make.

There are reasons why I wish to make a record of my position upon some of the points involved in this discussion. In the outset, I am opposed to a repeal of the neutrality laws. I believe that it is our duty to ourselves and the world, and our best policy, if we would perpetuate our power, and preserve the respect and amicable feelings of foreign Powers, to leave the act of 1818, guarding our neutrality, upon the statute-book. I am not a filibuster, and do not rise for the purpose of defending a violation of the neutrality laws of the United States. But I have been made to feel during this debate that justice has not been done to General Walker, and that it is my duty to give briefly my view of his public career—a career which has been so violently denounced here and elsewhere. Epithets of the most exceptionable character have been applied to General Walker by members of this House. He has been denounced by Commodore Paulding, by the President, and through the presses of the country, as a pirate, a robber, a marauder, and as one who has ruthlessly violated the law of nations.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that General Walker has violated the neutrality act of 1818. I know he is not a pirate, or a robber. Such epithets are unjust, and discreditable to gentlemen who employ them upon the floor of the House.

May I be indulged in briefly recurring to that action of General Walker which has called upon him such intemperate epithets as these? In 1854, civil war, as is usual in the Central American States, was raging in Nicaragua. General Castellon, the leader of one of those parties, and the one which had taken possession of nearly all the strong points in the country, sent to General Walker, then in California, a military commission to raise three hundred men and join him in the conflict. What did Walker do? He declined this commission, but sent word by the agent of Castellon: "If your Government will place in my hands a commission for colonization, I will accept it." Such a commission having been forwarded to him, (and I call the attention of gentlemen to such facts as these,)—a commission from Castellon, the provisional director of the party which had taken possession of the whole country, with the exception of New Granada, and one or two other unimportant points in the country—what did Walker do? He proceeded at once to lay this paper before the Federal officers of the United States in California, and to ask their opinion of it. He showed this commission to the district attorney of the United States for the northern district of California, and to the officer of the port of San Francisco.

They informed him that they regarded it as legitimate; that they did not see in it a violation of the neutrality laws of the United States; and that they would not interfere with him, but wished success to his enterprise. It is a striking fact that the captain of the revenue cutter lying in the port of San Francisco actually sent his sailors to bend the sails of the ship which carried Walker from California to the shores of Nicaragua.

When Walker landed, some complaint was made that American citizens were interfering in the local disputes of Nicaragua. When he learned this, he proposed that he would return to the United States. The spirit which he evinced on this occasion seems to have satisfied those who had given him the grant, and he was induced to join the provisional director. The first step taken by him and his followers, was to take the oath of allegiance to the Nicaraguan Government. He took the oath, and so did the fifty-six men who went with him, and they thereupon became citizens of the Republic of Nicaragua.

The first result of Walker's emigration (and interposition, if you please) was the reconciliation of the two parties which had divided the country. It is true, he had first captured Granada, but that achievement led to the happy result of bringing about a reconciliation of the two parties, and in establishing a Government which was more permanent than any Government that has existed in Nicaragua for many past years.

It will be recollected that, by the arrangement agreed upon, Rivas, the leader of the Legitimist faction, was made president, and General Walker, the leading spirit of the Liberal party, was made general-in-chief of the Nicaraguan army. The Legitimists themselves asked that General Walker should hold this position, that he might restrain his own followers. The Government thus organized sent a minister to the United States, and that minister was recognized by the United States. It is not unworthy of note that the Government resulting from this interposition of General Walker has been recognized by our own Government. There are a number of facts which, in this cursory view, I must pass over. But it will be recollected that this was a stable Government; that the neighboring Power of Costa Rica made war upon it, invading the territory, but was expelled with great slaughter.

There were followers of General Walker who proposed to go to the relief of a faction in Honduras, which was attempting to gain power; for it will be borne in mind that the people who inhabit the Central American States are a mongrel breed of negroes, Indians, and a few Spaniards, who are always at war with each other. Walker was opposed to interfering in the affairs of Honduras. This produced discontent among some of his supporters, and a league was formed with the other four Central American States to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. Meantime Walker was made President, and it was in the progress of the struggle which ensued that a United States naval officer landed on the coast of Nicaragua and informed General Henningsen that it was the purpose of the naval power of the United States to seize the schooner Granada, belonging to the Nicaraguan Government, and under the control of General Walker. By that and other representations calculated to deter, Captain Davis, the commander of the St. Mary's, influenced General Walker to make a capitulation. He soon after seized this schooner, and thus depriving him of all means of maintaining himself, he detained Walker as a prisoner, and brought him to the United States against his earnest remonstrances. Gentlemen have said that this was a mercy to him. He did not so regard it. Gentlemen have said that when he reached the United States he gave the President a pledge that he would never return to Nicaragua, or that he would not again violate the neutrality laws of the United States. I deny the truth of such statement. I deny that he ever gave such pledge. On the contrary, I affirm that he made it known in the face of the whole country that he meant to reinstate himself as soon as he could; that he everywhere asserted that he was a citizen of Nicaragua, and had been unjustly forced away from the country of his adoption; that he had been detained against his will and against his interest, and he loudly complained of this interference with him.

When Walker was thus removed from Nicaragua, Rivas, who had headed the movement in Nicaragua against him, was himself almost immediately expelled from the country by Martinez, who was made President by military force, with scarcely the form of an election; and Rivas is now a fugitive in England, distrusting all parties at home, and afraid to return to the country of his nativity.

Almost simultaneously with this usurpation on the part of Martinez, the Costa Rican Government attempted to seize the transit route, getting possession of the boats on Lake Nicaragua, all the river boats, and every fort and strong position on the whole line, except the single fort of San Carlos; and from that day to this, war has raged between Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

In the mean time, Walker frankly said to the President of the United States: "I have not violated the neutrality laws of the United States; I have wrongfully been forced from the country of my adoption; and it is my purpose to reinstate myself as soon as I can." He was arraigned before a court of justice upon a charge of violating the neutrality laws, and was honorably acquitted.

After struggling long and patiently against adverse circumstances, he at length succeeded in returning to Nicaragua, and he has again been seized by the naval forces of the United States, and forced away from the country of his adoption—that country which had made him first commander-in-chief of its army, and then chief Executive. While he has been deprived of his personal liberty, his property has been wrested from him and destroyed. This has been done without warrant of law. The conduct of Commodore Paulding, in this seizure of General Walker and his forces, is indeed "a grave error." The commodore's denunciation of General Walker as a robber and a pirate was a very gross impropriety. If he is a robber or a pirate, why was he liberated as soon as he was brought before the President? Why did the President refuse to recognize him as a prisoner? If he has violated the neutrality laws, why is it that the judicial tribunals have not punished him? If these denunciations are true, why is it that he has been permitted to go at large for ten days in the national capital, addressing a public letter to the President vindicating his course, while no man dared to lay his hand upon him? The truth is, he has not violated the neutrality laws; and these charges against him are most flagrant and unjust. To say the least, the question is judicial, and has not been decided against him. It is unjust to assume it until it is proved.

I know enough of General Walker to believe that he is a modest, quiet, self-reliant man, of bold conceptions and courage to execute them; a man of the very best ability and education; and that he has known he was sustained by the law at every step that he has taken. I believe that he has understood the Constitution and laws of the United States infinitely better than those who have denounced him so grossly and unjustly. I say that the act of Commodore Paulding was a gross outrage, but that he is not alone responsible. I will not stop to discuss the question whether the President has the right to authorize a naval officer to arrest a military expedition within a marine league of our shore or upon the high seas. Such issues are foreign to the particular case in hand. Commodore Paulding seized General Walker within the territorial jurisdiction of Nicaragua. This act, committed within the marine league or upon the shore of Nicaragua, is violative of the law of nations, and is not authorized by the act of 1818, or any other law of the United States. It is a usurpation of power not warranted by the Constitution of the United States.

But so far as Commodore Paulding is censurable, there are extenuating circumstances which ought, in justice to him, to be duly considered. The instructions of the Navy Department, taken in connection with the fact that the similar offense of Commander Davis has never been censured, were calculated to incite him to it. These instructions and this omission, considered with the fact that Captain Chatard, for failing to do what Commodore Paulding has done, has been withdrawn from his command, show what were the intentions of the Department. Then bear in mind the letter of the Secretary to Lieutenant Almy, and other circumstances which might be detailed, and how can it be doubted that Commodore Paulding acted precisely in accordance with the spirit of his instructions? I feel that it is but justice to him to consider those extenuating circumstances; for, sir, if Commodore Paulding has committed "a grave error," so did Commander Davis when he entered within the jurisdiction of Nicaragua and seized the property of Walker in the port of San Juan del Sur, for which he has never been censured. If he has committed "a grave error," Captain Chatard should not have been stricken from command for not doing a similar thing. When Lieutenant Almy received his copy of this very circular, he replied to the Secretary of the Navy:

"These directions to preserve the neutrality of the country are very plain for the government of officers where they are required to act in the ports of, or in the jurisdiction of, the United States; but I must confess that I might find myself embarrassed when required to act in a foreign and neutral port. Therefore, I must be pardoned for soliciting from the honorable Secretary of the Navy answers to certain questions, and more specific instructions in the premises. Suppose, for instance, that, while lying in a port of Central America, an American steamer should enter, having on board a large number of men whom I suspect of being 'filibusters,' &c., must I seize this vessel?"

Now, mark, here is a case supposed to arise within a port of Central America, just as Captain Chatard's did; and Lieutenant Almy asks if he should seize the vessel? What was the reply of the Secretary of the Navy? He said:

"You will be careful not to interfere with lawful commerce. But where you find that an American vessel is manifestly engaged in carrying on an expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States against the territories of Mexico, Nicaragua, or Costa Rica, contrary to the sixth section of the act of Congress of April 20, 1818, already referred to, you will use the force under your command to prevent it, and will not permit the men or arms engaged in it, or destined for it, to be landed in any port of Mexico or Central America."

Captain Chatard failed to do this, and for his failure was recalled. Paulding did no more than exercise dominion within Central American jurisdiction, which this would have been.

Now, Mr. Chairman, Commodore Paulding may not have known of those particular instructions, but I advert to them to show the policy of the Administration. The President in his message, sent in to the Senate a few days ago, puts a construction upon the law and that circular, which is in accordance with the view I have taken. He says, in relation to the act of 1818:

"In order to render the law effectual, it was necessary to prevent 'the carrying on' of such expeditions to their consummation after they had succeeded in leaving our shores. This has been done effectually, and in clear and explicit language," &c.

I quote this to show, in connection with the reply to Lieutenant Almy, who was expected to take position in a port of Central America, that the President believed that while a United States war vessel was lying in a port of Central America, if a steamer entered carrying a body of men such as Walker's, it was the duty of the captain to interpose, and exercise the power of this nation to prevent the expedition from landing.

Commodore Paulding, therefore, had reason to believe, from the action of the Government in relation to the conduct of Captain Davis, and from the conduct which caused Captain Chatard to be superseded, that it was the intention to have Walker arrested either within the marine league or upon the territory of Nicaragua, the one being as lawful as the other. The President argues as though the only question is whether the Government of Nicaragua objects to this conduct.

Mr. Chairman, that is not the only question. We have a written Constitution; we have a Government of laws, which it is our highest duty to preserve from infraction. If the President has done that by himself or by his agents which is unauthorized by the Constitution or the law, it is our duty to take cognizance of it. And that is not all. If we set up a justification of Commodore Paulding, and those who gave him instructions to exercise dominion in Central America, why may not the British Government, or any other Government, do the same thing? Why may not the other great naval Powers of the world, in all the civil feuds existing, and which may exist, between the mongrel peoples which inhabit Central America, avail themselves of this very precedent we have set them, and interpose in Central American affairs, assuming, as we have done, that one faction or party is the Government, and the other outlaws; seize and bring out of the country one faction, and set up and treat with the other? Why may not this example lead to an utter breaking down of our Monroe doctrine in relation to Nicaragua and other Central American States? These are points I must merely glance at. I have not time to argue them; and, indeed, it would be unjustifiable to treat them at length, in view of the elaborate debate which has already taken place.

I may state, in this connection, that in the instance of the Caroline, which was burned by the British within our jurisdiction, upon the Canada borders, some years ago, our Government did not recognize this doctrine of invading neutral territory; and when, at a later period, the British Government were endeavoring to organize a military force in our territory, it led to a long and bitter diplomatic correspondence between the two Governments. It seems that our Government then comprehended the inviolability of the soil of a neutral Power.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman would have any cause to complain if Great Britain should capture an expedition starting from Jamaica, with a view of making an inroad into Central America?

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Well, sir, that is a question which does not come so immediately home to the American people and the American Congress. We are not empowered with guardianship over the action of other Governments, or its subjects or citizens. But if our President and our naval officers attempt to assert power not authorized by the Constitution and the laws of the Union, it is our right and our duty carefully to scrutinize their conduct.

The President has, in his message, shadowed forth a policy with relation to Central America to which I cannot give my assent. He informs us that the treaty we made with New Granada, in 1846, binds us to make secure the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama, and to guaranty to that Government the right of dominion over its territory. He intimates, what I have heard elsewhere, that there is now an inchoate treaty existing between Nicaragua and the United States, based upon this same line of policy, and that it is his intention to make similar treaties with all the other Central American Governments; that is, treaties binding us to protect their neutrality and guaranty their dominion over the soil.

If we look to our experiences with New Granada during the eleven years since the treaty was made, we shall find little inducement to pursue this policy further. I cite, for example, the various outbreaks which have occurred within that period in the territory of New Granada, and particularly the massacre of citizens of the United States at Panama, in 1856. It would seem that, unless the President should be authorized to use the military and naval force in Central America, which he has asked for in his message, it would be impossible to secure the stability of the isthmus, and prevent the oft-recurring civil broils and disturbances which have cursed that people. My opinion is, that stability and peace upon the isthmus of Central America, including that of Panama, is all-important to the best interests of the United States, in view of our Pacific and Atlantic possessions. It is more important to the United States than to any other Power. The policy pursued by the treaty of New Granada can never secure us that unless we keep a large military and naval force in Central America, which would be a hazardous stretch of authority. Besides, such a policy would tend merely to set up dominion for those who are unable to secure it for themselves, for the benefit of an ignorant, feeble, miserable people, who are unable to govern themselves. If the United States are to occupy and exercise dominion in Central America, let it be for an American population, with American laws and constitutions. If General Walker, without violating the neutrality laws of the United States—which I do not believe he has done—can build up a stable Government there, and bring about peace and quiet, he will have prepared that country for an American population which will ultimately add to the strength and renown of the American Union.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, obtained the floor.

Mr. GARTRELL. If my colleague will yield for that purpose, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not desire to address the committee this evening.

Mr. BLAIR. I rise to a question of order. I claim the floor, the gentleman from Georgia having already addressed the committee once upon this question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Missouri is mistaken. I have not spoken upon this question. I spoke upon my own amendment to amend the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] by striking out "a select committee," and inserting "the Committee on the Judiciary." That amendment was afterwards accepted; and then the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] renewed, substantially, the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, and it is upon that that this debate has been proceeding. I have not spoken upon that question.

Mr. BLAIR. It is substantially the same question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia delivered his remarks upon the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] being then pending. The amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi has since been incorporated into the original resolution. The pending question now is on the amendment subsequently offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] and the amendment thereto offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER.] The gentleman from Georgia has not spoken upon that amendment, and is now entitled to the floor. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. LETCHER. Before a vote is taken on the motion that the committee rise, let us have an understanding that the committee take a recess until seven o'clock this evening. There are several gentlemen who desire to speak on this question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to that.

Mr. BLAIR. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. This is substantially the same question as the one upon which the gentleman from Georgia addressed the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the rule upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The first part of the 37th rule is as follows:

"No member shall speak more than once to the same question without leave of the House."

The Chair decides that the pending question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and that upon that question the gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor. From this decision the gentleman from Missouri appeals.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to hear the amendments read. I do not care about hearing the original resolutions read.

The CHAIRMAN. In order that the committee may understand the whole question, the Clerk will now read the original resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] as modified; the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] and the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER.]

Mr. BLAIR. I would ask the Chair if the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts was not ruled out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. It was not.

Mr. BLAIR. That was my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is mistaken. No question of order was raised on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BLAIR. I take the ground that it is substantially the same question as the one upon which the gentleman from Georgia before addressed the committee.

The original resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to a uniform bankrupt law, and that so much of the President's annual message as relates to the duties of an independent State in its relations with the members of the great family of nations, to restrain its people from acts of hostile aggression against their citizens or subjects; and so much as relates to the present neutrality law of the 30th of April, 1818; to the fitting out within the limits of our country of lawless expeditions against some of the Central American States; to the instructions issued to the marshals, and district attorneys, and to the appropriate Army and Navy officers, together with the President's recommendation that we should adopt such measures as will be effective in restraining our citizens from committing such outrages, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who are hereby required to inquire into and report upon the expediency of the repeal or modification of said act of 29th of April, 1818, with power to report by bill or otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the original resolution as modified. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] moved to amend the resolution by inserting after the words "bankrupt law," the words "be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary," and by striking out all after the word "outrages," and inserting in lieu thereof "be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs." The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] offered the following as an amendment to the amendment:

And also, that said committee report, so far as they may be able, the present social and political condition of the people of Nicaragua, and whether they invite colonies from the United States to settle among them; and also, whether the soil, climate, and other natural advantages of that country are such as to encourage emigration thither from the northern States of this Confederacy.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. I understand the Clerk to have read first the resolution as introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES.]

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; he read it as modified by the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submitted a resolution to refer certain matters to the Judiciary Committee. The gentleman from Mississippi proposed an amendment, and upon consultation between that gentleman and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman modified his amendment in some particulars, and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania incorporated it into the original resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Allow me to make a statement. I spoke to an amendment which I offered to an amendment. That was accepted both by the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Messrs. QUITMAN and J. GLANCY JONES,] and the original proposition was thus modified. That was done immediately after my speech.

Mr. BLAIR. I would inquire of the gentleman from Georgia whether he proposes to confine himself to the discussion of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, or whether he proposes to speak to the whole question?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I intend to speak to the whole question.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I insist on my appeal.

Mr. STANTON. I believe this appeal is debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly it is.

Mr. STANTON. Then, I would say that the rule has a common sense as well as a technical view. This debate is practically on the President's message, and on all subjects included in it. It covers the entire policy of the country; and whatever amendment, or amendment to an amendment may have been offered in the progress of the debate, the character of the debate itself is general. Now, if I understand the meaning and the spirit of the rule, it is, that it shall not be in the power of the occupant of the chair, in a debate confined by the rules to a single hour, to permit any gentleman to occupy more than one hour in debate. If the ruling of the Chair here is correct, it would permit one gentleman to make substantially two speeches in the same debate and on the same question, while a dozen members are seeking the floor to make their first speech upon it. I submit that this ruling is a total subversion of the spirit of the rule, and I shall therefore sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR.] I think that in all fairness, in the execution of the rules of the House, he should be permitted to have the floor.

The question being, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for tellers.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STANTON. Perhaps we might relieve ourselves of this difficulty by taking a recess till seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not see any use in having a recess to-night. Heretofore, when we have had recesses, two or three members came with speeches in their pockets, and merely asked leave to have them published. That cannot now be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order. The question is, "Shall the committee now rise?"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We may as well rise, for there is not a quorum present.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I trust the committee will not rise until this point be settled.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the motion was agreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 50, noes 39.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PHELPS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed the following bill and resolutions; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 32) to repeal an act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the names of vessels in certain cases," approved the 5th of March, 1856; and

A resolution (S. No. 4) to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.'"

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I ask my colleague to withdraw that motion to allow me to introduce a bill.

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is no quorum present to do business.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given. It is not a bill making an appropriation; it is not a partisan bill, but it is a bill to which there will be no objection.

Mr. LETCHER. I object because there is no quorum here.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at forty minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Prayer by Rev. G. S. DEAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

He also presented the petition of James M. Hand, in behalf of the heirs of John B. Hand, praying that certain moneys paid for the purchase of Choctaw reservations may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOUSTON presented the petition of Samuel Stone and Isaac H. Marks, praying for compensation for property taken by an Indian agent, under an agreement of arbitration, for Government purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Jane Stoneham, widow of Henry Stoneham, a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed the benefits of the law of July 7, 1838, granting pensions to the widows of revolutionary officers and soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Michigan, presented January 11, praying for bounty land for services in the patriot war of 1834, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, for the reason that under an act of the last Congress parol proof may be received, which would meet the case of the petitions; which was agreed to.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Haynes, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the petition of the children of Polly Colgrove; the memorial of W. P. Wright, Mark Sheppard, and other members of Captain Samuel Walker's company of Kansas militia; the petition of John A. Ragan; the petition of Solomon G. Grover and others; the petition of J. M. Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a petition of Frederick A. Beelen, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 61) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

MINNESOTA RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. BELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. HOUSTON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the admission of the Territory of Kansas into the Union as a State.

Mr. CHANDLER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill making an additional appropriation for deepening the channel of the St. Clair flats.

COMMODORE PAULDING.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced that the first business in order was the joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding; and it was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It requests the President of the United States to cause to be made a medal, with suitable devices, to be presented to Commodore Paulding as a testimonial of the high sense entertained by Congress of his gallant and judicious conduct on the 8th of December, 1857, in arresting a lawless military expedition, "set on foot" in the United States, under the command of General Walker, and in preventing the same from carrying on actual war against the feeble and almost defenseless Republic of Nicaragua, with which the United States are at peace.

Mr. SLIDELL. I suggest that, in the absence of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] who has given notice of his intention to offer an amendment to the resolution, its consideration had better be postponed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was about to make the same suggestion which the honorable Senator from Louisiana has made for me, and for the additional reason that some members of the Senate, who may desire to take part in this discussion, prefer that it should be postponed to a subsequent day. I move to postpone the consideration of the resolution until Wednesday of next week, if there be no special order for that day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At what hour?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. At one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And be made the special order for that hour?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until Wednesday next, at one o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN R. TEMPLE.

The bill (S. No. 38) for the relief of John R. Temple, of Louisiana, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to confirm Temple's title to six hundred and seventy arpents of land in the "Baron de Bastrop grant," on the east side of bayou Bartholomew; but this confirmation is to operate only as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States.

The claim of John R. Temple was not filed with the commissioners under the act of 1851, providing for the adjustment of private land claims in the Baron de Bastrop grant, on the ground, as he alleges, that he believed his claim was confirmed with the Bonaventure claim, which it adjoins. The claimant, and the persons under whom he holds, have been in uninterrupted possession of a part of the lands since 1807, and the remainder since 1812 and 1814; and they have been inhabited and cultivated from these dates, respectively, up to this time. Two affidavits, accompanying the papers, show that the lands have been inhabited and cultivated for more than twenty years. The Committee on Private Land Claims are unanimously of the opinion that if this claim had been presented to the commissioners under the act of 1851, with the proofs now before the committee, such commissioners would have recommended this claim for confirmation. The omission of the memorialist to present his claim to the commissioners ought not to defeat the rights of the claimant under the act of 1851.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY VOLCKER.

The bill (S. No. 39) to confirm the title of Henry Volcker, to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the confirmation of Henry Volcker's title to six hundred and forty acres of land, in the Territory of New Mexico, being the tract located by virtue of a certificate numbered 169, of the second class, issued by the board of land commissioners for the county of Bexar and Republic of Texas, to Simon Prado, and dated January 5, 1846, and more particularly described in the plat and field notes accompanying survey number thirty-eight, in section number fifteen, situated on the table land or plain between the Rio Grande and the Pecos river, now on file in the office of the commissioner of the general land office of the State of Texas. This confirmation, however, is only to be construed into a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States.

Mr. STUART. I perceive that this bill has been reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims, and it refers to land in the Territory of New Mexico, where there are no public surveys. There is a bill before the Senate for organizing the Territory of Arizona, which is to take part of New Mexico. It seems to me that, before proceeding to pass this bill, although it reserves individual rights, we ought to have, either from the committee or from the report, some facts to show the propriety of acting on it. I am entirely ignorant myself of it. If the report is not a lengthy one, I should like to hear it read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, but before concluding—

Mr. STUART rose and said: This bill, it is apparent from the report, involves questions connected with the arrangement we made with Texas about her boundary; and, inasmuch as I do not wish to prejudice the case at all, (the chairman of the committee who made the report being absent,) I move to postpone the consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM K. JENNINGS AND OTHERS.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (S. No. 29) for the relief of William K. Jennings and others. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of the fund heretofore received from Great Britain, under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, for slaves taken and carried away by the forces of Great Britain during the war of 1812, to William K. Jennings, and Aphia Jennings, his wife, $1,120 for four slaves carried off by the British forces in June, 1813; to Henry A. Wise, $280, for one slave taken and carried away in December, 1814; to Ann Robinson, $280, for one slave, taken and carried away from Virginia in June, 1813; and to Edward Rudd, $1,680, for six slaves, taken and carried away from Virginia in the spring of 1813; to the legal representatives of Robert Lindsay, deceased, $390, for one slave, taken and carried away from the possession of his owner in the city of Charleston, South Carolina; and to the legal representatives of Benjamin Hodges, of Maryland, $280, for one slave conveyed from the United States on board the British fleet, in the year 1814, and not recovered by said Hodges, or his legal representatives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. KING. I should like to hear the report in that case read.

The Secretary read a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, from which it appeared that, some time during the late war with Great Britain, while the enemy's fleet was lying in the Chesapeake bay, a negro man, Sam, aged about twenty-one years, the property of William Bean, the father of Aphia Jennings, and a negro woman, Esther, the property of Sarah Almond, escaped from the possession of their owners, in the county of Elizabeth City, Virginia, and were carried off by the fleet, and were never afterwards recovered. Sarah Almond was the sister of William Bean, and died, intestate and without issue, in his lifetime, leaving him her only heir-at-law. William Bean has since died, leaving his daughter, Aphia

Jennings, his only heir-at-law. The belief that the fund provided for such cases had all been exhausted, has hitherto prevented an application for relief in this case.

In the case of Henry A. Wise, it is shown by the evidence filed, that, in the fall of 1814, a negro man, Nelson, aged about nineteen years, previously allotted to the petitioner in the division of his father's estate, ran away to the British fleet, then lying near Tangier Island, in the Chesapeake bay, and was carried away on board of the Dragon seventy-four, and in the latter part of January, 1815, landed on Cumberland Island, on the southeastern coast of Georgia, placed in one of the colored regiments, and never returned to his owner. As a reason for the delay in presenting this claim, the petitioner states that he was but eight years of age at the time of the escape; that his first guardian, John Cropper, died in 1821, before any distribution of pay for deported slaves was made by the commissioners under the treaty of Ghent; and that his second guardian, John Custis, was not informed of the loss of the slave until it was too late to have it acted upon by the commissioners.

In the case of Ann Robinson, it is shown by the evidence that on the day of the memorable action at Hampton, Virginia, in June, 1813, a negro man, Hampton, the property of the petitioner's husband, Henry Robinson, was forcibly taken from his possession and carried on board of a British ship then lying in Hampton roads, and has never been returned. Under the will of her husband she is entitled, as residuary legatee, to whatever compensation may be allowed for the slave. The petitioner further states that she was not aware, until recently, that any provision had ever been made for the payment of such claims.

In the case of Edward Rudd, the testimony shows that the petitioner is the son and heir of Edward Rudd, deceased, late of Elizabeth City county, Virginia; that some time during the late war with Great Britain, while the enemy's ships were lying in Hampton Roads, six slaves—a negro man, Stepney, a negro woman, Crinner, and four children—were taken from the possession of the petitioner's father and carried off by the British, and have never been returned.

In the case of Mary Martin, it appears from the testimony that, in the year 1813, during the late war with Great Britain, a negro man named Ned, the property of her former husband, Robert Lindsay, was captured by the enemy and carried away from the possession of his owner, then residing in Charleston, South Carolina, and never afterwards recovered. And in the case of Benjamin Hodges, it appears that the negro man Phil, belonging to the husband of the petitioner, was taken off by the British army on its return from Washington city to the fleet then lying in the Patuxent, and that his owner has never regained him.

It appears from Executive Document No. 122, accompanying a letter from the President of the United States to the House of Representatives, dated March 8, 1826, that the average value of the slaves taken and carried away by the British from the State of Virginia, as agreed upon and fixed by the commission appointed under the award of the Emperor of Russia, was $280 each; and those taken from the State of South Carolina, $390 each. It further appears, from a certificate of the Register of the Treasury, dated February 26, 1852, "that the balance unpaid of the fund received from Great Britain under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, amounts to $4,112 89;" and upon recent inquiry at the Treasury Department, the committee have ascertained that that amount still remains unexpended.

The balance in the Treasury of the fund received from Great Britain as indemnity for slaves carried away by the British in the war of 1812, is $4,112 89; of which this bill provides the following payments, viz: to William K. Jennings and wife, for four slaves at $280, $1,120; to Henry A. Wise, for one slave, $280; to Ann Robinson, for one slave, $280; to Edward Rudd, for six slaves at $280, $1,680; to Robert Lindsay's representatives, for one slave, $390—being a total of $3,750; leaving as a balance of the fund still remaining $362 89.

From two several letters emanating from the Department of State, one dated February 24, 1852, and the other June 26, 1854, it appears that none of these petitioners have ever received any compensation for the slaves taken and carried away.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?"

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to discuss the bill. I simply rise to ask for the yeas and nays upon it, and to express my regret, that when the committee was framing this bill, they did not provide for using up the whole fund. I am sorry that there are $360 left. I will simply say that I shall vote against the bill, because, as I understand it, (and I think I do not misunderstand it,) it recognizes the doctrine that there may be property in human beings; and I never will, by my vote, or by my silence, admit that there can be such a property, and therefore I want to record my vote against the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. Before the vote is taken, I think it proper to say that this bill has been very fully discussed in the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which I have the honor to be a member; and in that committee I dissented from the report, and shall vote against the bill, in accordance with the vote I gave in committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. The report just read cites the first article of the treaty of Ghent as the basis on which the claim rests. On a reference to that article, I find not one word in it on this subject.

There is, therefore, some mistake; it is probably a misprint in the report. The reference should, perhaps, be to some other convention; and I should like to have it corrected. I desire to know what treaty or convention is the true one, in order that I may look at it for the purpose of settling in my mind one question—whether the stipulation was to pay for negroes who ran away, or for negroes who were carried away. The report sets forth that these negroes ran over to the British, and then they took them away.

Mr. MASON. Not all of them; some did.

Mr. HAMLIN. It does certainly state that some did so, for I heard it so read. There may be a broad distinction between these cases. I shall not vote for the bill any way; but, assuming that there is a fund remaining, and assuming that our Government is liable to pay for the negroes whom the British forcibly carried away, the owners of those forcibly carried away are entitled to the pay, and we should be misappropriating the fund if we paid it for negroes who ran away. I think there is a broad distinction between the cases. I should like, therefore, to know what article is referred to, so that I can see the language and understand precisely whether the claim comes within the language of the treaty.

Mr. MASON. The report which is made by the Committee on Foreign Relations in this case was a transcript of a report made by the same committee at the last session. I was familiar with the facts at the time the report was drawn up, which was some two years, or probably more, ago. I am not prepared to admit or deny the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Maine, that the report misrecites the article of the treaty under which provision was made to pay for slaves. That to which he refers was a convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and his Britannic Majesty, nothing more. I have no doubt, with a little time, that I could refer to the specific convention, and probably, as it is so recited in the report, you will find that the first article of the treaty is that properly referred to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like to see it.

Mr. MASON. So would I, if we had time to hunt it up. I suppose the Senator does not doubt that there was a convention between the United States and Great Britain, by which provision was made for the payment of slaves that were deported by the British ships during the war. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] has been kind enough to find the treaty and place it in my hands. It is the treaty with Great Britain, which was ratified July 12, 1822, and the exchange of ratifications was made January 10, 1823. After the formal introduction, citing the causes which brought the Governments together to treat, the first paragraph, although it is not technically entitled in the body of the treaty as an article, has this provision:

"That the United States of America are entitled to claim from Great Britain a just indemnification for all private property which the British forces may have carried away; and as the question relates to slaves more especially, for all the slaves that the British forces may have carried away from places and territories of which the treaty stipulates the restitution, in quitting these same places and territories.

"That the United States are entitled to consider as having been so carried away all such slaves as may have been transferred from the abovementioned territories to British vessels within the waters of the said territories, and who, for this reason, may not have been restored.

"But that if there should be any American slaves who were carried away from territories of which the first article of the treaty of Ghent has not stipulated the restitution to the United States, the United States are not entitled to claim an indemnification for the said slaves.

"Now, for the purpose of carrying into effect this award of his Imperial Majesty, as arbitrator, his good offices have been further invoked to assist in framing such convention or articles of agreement between the United States of America and his Britannic Majesty, as shall provide the mode of ascertaining and determining the value of slaves and of other private property, which may have been carried away in contravention of the treaty of Ghent, and for which indemnification is to be made to the citizens of the United States, in virtue of his Imperial Majesty's said award, and shall secure compensation," &c.

Then the treaty provides for arbitrators and for the proceeding under it. The provision of it seems to have been to pay for all slaves that were carried away, deported, and not subsequently returned to the owners. The report sets out specifically, in each case, the reasons why the claimant did not prefer the claim before the commission which was sitting under the treaty for the purpose of arbitrating these claims. One honorable Senator on the other side of the Chamber, has indicated that he cannot vote for claims of this character, to pay for slaves, under any circumstances. I would submit to honorable Senators, even on that side of the Chamber, that the King of Great Britain, actuated by that good faith which has always obtained in that nation, certainly in reference to indemnity, has submitted to the award of the Emperor of Russia, and has paid all claims of this sort which were adjudicated by the commission or came before them; and I should think that, considering the state of the opinions of Great Britain—opinions which I am gratified to see are rapidly undergoing a change—in relation to the condition of slavery, if the King of Great Britain has agreed to provide this indemnity, Senators of the United States may safely follow that example.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question originated by the Senator from Maine is a question which will have an important bearing on my vote upon this bill. If, by the treaty with Great Britain, the money is in our Treasury to pay for slaves that were stolen, or captured, or taken away, I know no reason why I should not vote to pay from that money to the persons who are entitled to receive it from the Treasury. I do not understand that that would be at all liable to the objection which is made by the Senator from New Hampshire, that it would admit that our Constitution itself recognizes property in man. It only recognizes that persons may be held to service by the laws of the States. I confess that, upon the facts presented, I am not now sufficiently advised to record a vote satisfactorily to myself; I should prefer, therefore, that this bill be postponed.

Mr. SEWARD. It is evident, sir, that the proposition to pay money for slaves is presented in this bill in the simplest and most unobjectionable form in which it could be offered. It comes nearest to an exception to the principle stated justly by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire; but, nevertheless, it is a transaction between Great Britain and the United States, in which Great Britain has recognized property in man, and it is presented for my vote—yea or nay. When I shall have given my vote for this bill, I shall have made myself a party to that transaction. There is no necessity, in my view, for doing so. There is no principle, no sentiment, no feeling, no motive in my constitution, that will permit me to acknowledge property by man in man. It does not at all mitigate my opposition that Great Britain has agreed to it. I must take this occasion to differ from the honorable Senator from Virginia as to the conclusion at which he has arrived, namely, that there is a change of public sentiment on this subject in Great Britain.

The best observation that I have made on that point, has brought me to the conclusion that there possibly is a political change in the Government of Great Britain, in favor of slavery to some extent; but while that is the result of commercial and other influences operating on the Government, I am satisfied that the opinion of the people of Great Britain, and of mankind generally, is today more strongly and firmly combined and consolidated in favor of universal freedom than ever before. If I thought, with the honorable Senator from Virginia, that Great Britain was going over to the side of slavery in this great dispute, it would be an additional reason why I should withhold my concurrence, because it would be so much the more necessary to protest, when friends so distinguished, and who have acted so grand a part in this great battle, as the people of Great Britain, had faltered and were falling away from the cause of truth and virtue.

Mr. MASON. I wish, sir, to refer the honorable Senator from Maine to the first article of the treaty of peace made at Ghent, which we were in search of. That article contains this provision:

"All territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken by either party from the other during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves, or other private property."

Mr. PUGH. It seems to me, sir, that this is a very simple question. In the articles of peace, as read by the Senator from Virginia, which were signed at Ghent, it was stipulated that the British forces, in retiring, should restore all the property of every description which had been taken from the people of the United States within their territories, and slaves were specially mentioned in the treaty. That is not a new provision. The identical provision will be found in the preliminary articles of peace signed at Paris, acknowledging the Independence of the United States, and reiterated in the definitive treaty of peace signed, I think, in the spring of the following year. A question, however, arose upon the treaty of Ghent, as read by the Senator from Virginia, which led to negotiations that resulted in the subsequent treaty of 1822, which he also read, and which was more specific on this very point. Although he read that passage, I shall take the liberty of reading it again.

The question, it seems, had been referred to the arbitration of the Emperor of Russia to interpret the treaty of Ghent on this very subject, and he made an award which, if the Senate will pardon me, I shall read. He made it twice. The first award will be found in the eighth volume of the Statutes at Large, page 292, and reiterated on page 294, in which the arbitrator decided the very question which the Senator from Maine now suggests—whether this indemnification was to be for slaves who took refuge with the British commanders, and were carried away, or for those who were taken violently, and against their own will. The Emperor of Russia decided that the British Government should pay us for the slaves who ran away from their masters, and took refuge with the British forces. The British Government has paid the money, and we have it; and now we propose to keep it, and to set up a question of morality against the owner of the slaves after we have received the money!

The British Government, it appears, protested against paying for these slaves, and in response to this objection, Count Nesselrode, in a letter to Mr. Middleton, of April 22, 1822, said:

"In answer to this observation, the undersigned is charged by his Imperial Majesty to communicate what follows to the Minister of the United States of America.

"The Emperor having, by the mutual consent of the two plenipotentiaries, given an opinion, founded solely upon the sense which results from the text of the article in dispute, does not think himself called upon to decide here any question relative to what the laws of war permit or forbid to the belligerents; but, always faithful to the grammatical interpretation of the first article of the treaty of Ghent, his Imperial Majesty declares, a second time, that it appears to him according to this interpretation—

"That, in quitting the places and territories of which the treaty of Ghent stipulates the restitution to the United States, his Britannic Majesty's forces had no right to carry away from these same places and territories, absolutely, any slave, by whatever means he had fallen or come into their power."

That is the decision of the umpire. Then this treaty was made and ratified in July, 1822, by which Great Britain paid us the value of these slaves, and we have the money; but now instead of paying it to the persons to whom it was stipulated it should be paid under the treaty, we propose, as I say, to keep the money, and to plead a sort of gambling plea or something else. It seems to me to be the plainest question that ever was presented to the Senate. We have the money, and it belongs to these people.

As to the question of property in men, I do not think that arises. I find in our books, cases of actions brought by the master for enticing away his apprentice, binding courts and jurors to give a verdict equivalent to the value of the service of the apprentice taken. I do not care whether you call him slave or apprentice, we have recognized the right to the money, and we have the money, and I think we ought to pay it to the man who owned the slaves.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Biggs, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Doolittle, Douglas, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sidel, Stuart, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, King, Seward, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—15.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read a third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 14, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. W. H. CHAPMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the call of committees for reports; and that reports were in order from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have a report to offer from the Committee of Elections.

PRINTING OF PAPERS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I would not interfere with my colleague, but there is only one hour left for debate on the President's message. I therefore move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

But, prior to that motion being put, I must ask permission to have some papers, relative to the deficiency bill, printed, for the use of the Committee of Ways and Means and of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. ASHURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a resolution to extend and define the authority of the President under the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" in respect to dropped and retired naval officers; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

QUESTION OF ORDER.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now renew my motion.

Mr. MORGAN. There was a difference of opinion yesterday with regard to who was entitled to the floor in committee; and to obviate all difficulty in that respect, I hope that by common consent the time for debate may be extended one hour. That will settle all the difficulty, and be perfectly satisfactory, I presume, to all sides of the House. I therefore ask that by common consent the limit of debate may be extended one hour.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have no objection to the extension of time one hour by common consent. But I wish to call the attention of the House—

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that the question of order was raised in committee, and that the Chair has no cognizance of the question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I know that. The members present know very well that the question of order was in committee. But I wish to call the attention of the House, before this matter is settled, to a decision in point, made in the Twenty-Eighth Congress; and the ruling in committee, and in the House, has been uniform ever since this decision. I read from the House Journal of March 6, 1844:

"Mr. DUNCAN again obtained the floor, and proceeded to debate the question on said amendment.

"Mr. DICKINSON made a question of order, that Mr. DUNCAN having spoken one hour since this bill was taken up for consideration, it was not in order for him again to speak.

"The SPEAKER (Mr. HORTON being in the chair) decided that inasmuch as an amendment had been offered since Mr. DUNCAN had spoken, and the question was entirely changed, he was entitled to the floor.

"From this decision Mr. DICKINSON appealed; and

"The question was put, 'Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?'

"And decided in the affirmative."

I have the report of the debate on that very case in which those learned in parliamentary law sustained the decision of the Chair; and that has been the uniform practice of the House since.

Mr. HOUSTON. This question I understand to be debatable in committee.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wished to make this statement, and I call the attention of the House to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I waive the point as to whether the gentleman is right or wrong. Assuming that he is right, I think that time may be saved by the proposition which I have made, and which I presume will be satisfactory to all sides of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. As I stated, I have no objection to the extension of time, but I wish it distinctly understood that it is not by way of concession of any right on my part, for I am clearly entitled to the floor under the rule and ruling of the House.

Mr. MORGAN. I now ask that by unanimous consent the time for closing debate be extended to two o'clock to-day.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

REFERENCE OF PAPERS.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion for a moment. I desire to return the papers in the case of John C. Rives, in order to have them referred to the Committee on Printing and Binding. They were erroneously sent to the Committee of Ways and Means.

It was so ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to have a resolution read, which I desire to introduce. It will consume no time, and it is of some consequence that it should be acted on.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The time for debate having been extended, I have no objection to anything which will not consume too much time.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Phelps in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] moving the reference of a certain portion of the message to the Committee on Military Affairs; upon which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] is entitled to the floor. The question immediately pending, however, is on an appeal from the decision of the Chair, taken by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR.] The gentleman from Missouri raised the question of order that the gentleman from Georgia was not entitled to the floor on the ground that he had spoken once on the pending question. The Chair overruled the question of order, and now desires to state that in 1854 a similar question of order was made upon a distinguished gentleman from Missouri. The ruling of the Chair was then the same as that of the Chair in the present case. The Chair now refers to the Congressional Globe of 1854. After Mr. Benton had consumed an hour, Mr. Wentworth, of Illinois, offered an amendment, and Mr. Benton was assigned the floor again, and went on with the speech which he had commenced. The ruling of the Chair yesterday was in accordance with the universal practice of the House.

Mr. BLAIR. In consequence of the extension of the time allowed for debate, I beg leave to withdraw my appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I cannot, in the little time which I have, reply to all that has been said in this debate which does not meet my approval, and which I think founded in error. I shall, however, in the remarks which I make, confine myself to a few principles which govern the whole question.

The proposition before the committee is to refer certain matters to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report upon the expediency of a repeal or modification of the existing laws upon the subject of the neutrality of the United States. I stated to the committee, when the subject was first mentioned, some reasons why I thought there ought to be a modification of some parts of the act of 1818. The views then presented by me, and by others who spoke on my side of the question, have been commented on at large by gentlemen on both sides of the House.

Now, sir, I wish to state in the outset that I do not intend that gentlemen on the other side of the question shall occupy our ground in this discussion. They shall not stand before the country as the advocates of law and order to the exclusion of myself and those who agree with me in the views which I present. They shall not stand before the country as the exclusive defenders and friends of the faith of treaties and the duties growing out of international law. That, sir, is the ground I stand upon. It is the ground I assumed when I addressed the committee before. I am here to-day as the advocate of law and order, of constitutional and international law. I am not in favor of individuals or nations breaking faith. I am here to defend the Constitution and laws, as I understand them, and the maintenance of the good faith of this nation. It is they who advocate and defend a breach of the law under the pretext of enforcing law.

Gentlemen have argued this question as if they supposed that I were against the maintenance of the neutral relations of this Government, as if I were in favor either of nations or individuals violating the public faith. I disclaim it. I am for the national faith; and, so far as the laws of the United States declare or embody or set forth the law of nations, I would not erase a word or modify a syllable. I am not for repealing or abrogating our neutrality laws, so far as they express the laws of nations. But, if it be so, that a part of the act of 1818 goes further than the law of nations, I am myself in favor of a modification of that act to that extent. And, if there be any part of the law of 1818, which admits of a doubt, I am in favor of removing that doubt. Section eight of the act of 1818 does admit of a doubtful construction. Different Administrations of this Government have put different constructions upon that section of the act of 1818. I say that it should be made clear and distinct, beyond a doubt. As I said the first day, I say now, that is the part of legislators, and that is what I want to have done.

Now, sir, I wish to call the attention of this committee to the eighth section of the act of 1818, and I wish the reporters to publish that section in full, that those who may read hereafter, may understand as well as those who now hear me, with the law before them, what is the law upon this subject:

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That in every case in which a vessel shall be fitted out and armed, or attempted to be fitted out and armed, or in which the force of any vessel of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, shall be increased or augmented, or in which any military expedition or enterprise shall be begun or set on foot, contrary to the provisions and prohibitions of this act; and in every case of the capture of a ship or vessel within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States as before defined, and in every case in which any process issuing out of any court of the United States shall be disobeyed or resisted by any person or persons having the custody of any vessel of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, or of any subjects or citizens of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, in every such case it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, for the purpose of taking possession of and detaining any such ship or vessel, with her prize or prizes, if any, in order to the execution of the prohibitions and penalties of this act, and to the restoring the prize or prizes in the cases in which restoration shall have been adjudged, and also for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territories or jurisdiction of the United States against the territories or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace."

In the first place, I affirm, I challenge contradiction; I defy any man to rise upon this floor and say that, under this act as it stands, the President can use the Army or Navy at all, either inside or outside of the marine league. It is only by construction, it is only by interpolating some words; for the language of the law is that he shall use "such part of the land and naval force." What part? Does it mean such as he may deem necessary? It does not say so. Does it mean such as may be in a certain place? What does it mean? Where is the correlative of such? As the section stands, it is meaningless; words were omitted. Read it for yourselves. There was clearly an omission in copying. But what I mean is, that this section needs revision and amendment. As it now stands, the President cannot, but by implication, but by construction, but by supplying some words not expressed, use any part of the military force anywhere.

Now, sir, I am not opposed to the President using such portion of the naval and land force of the country as may be necessary to enforce the laws. I do not want any gentleman to understand me as maintaining any such doctrine. I think the President should be clothed, and amply clothed, with powers to enforce your laws. But the law, as it stands, is meaningless and senseless.

There is, Mr. Chairman, another matter of doubtful construction in this act besides that. That is whether, under this eighth section, the President can use the land and naval force outside of the marine league, even with the omitted words supplied?—whether the law intended that he should? I stated when up before, and repeat now, that I do not believe that it was the intention of the act ever to confer upon the President any power outside of the marine league. I stated to the committee then, that I did not give the opinion without reflection. It was no new subject to me; and I now maintain all I then said.

I premise by stating this proposition: that all laws, in the legislation of this or any other country, are to be interpreted and understood as intra-territorial, and to apply within the jurisdiction of the law-making power, unless the contrary is expressed. General acts of Parliament do not extend to provinces or colonies without being so expressed. I affirm that, as an indisputable proposition, this act upon its face is intra-territorial. Whenever you give power to your Navy upon the high seas, or express extra-territorial legislative authority, it is so stated in the law, and expressly. Now, if we measure this law by that rule of construction, we are bound to suppose that the Legislature did not intend anything but an intra-territorial law. From the beginning to the end, everything about it shows that that was the intention.

Mr. GROESBECK. If the gentleman will allow me, I will call his attention to section third, which makes it penal for a person or citizen outside of the jurisdiction of the United States, to fit out a vessel to cruise against the citizens or vessels of the United States; and it further provides that, if that be done outside of the United States, the person who does it shall be tried in the court of the district where he is first brought. That is the language.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. GROESBECK. And, furthermore, the eighth section gives the authority to the President to employ the naval force to prevent the commission of this crime outside of the United States.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That is your inference. That is the construction the gentleman has put upon it. Now, sir, the section to which the gentleman first alludes does declare, if an individual outside of the United States commits the offense that he states, if he be a citizen of the United States, that he shall be punished. But he is to be taken within the jurisdiction of the United States. In that part of the law which goes to the penalty, he is first to be caught, and caught inside. That is my construction. There is nothing here which commissions the President to go upon the high seas and seize such a citizen. That the gentleman infers; and I say that the inference is by construction, and an erroneous one. He has no authority to do it; moreover, this being a penal statute, it is to be strictly construed.

Mr. Chairman, I state as a second proposition, and I wish gentlemen to attend to it, that the President of the United States cannot use the military force—the militia, the Army, or the Navy, except by permission of the law; and here at the beginning, I differ radically, with almost every gentleman who has been upon the opposite side of this question. The gentleman, himself, who has just interrupted me, asked the other day, where is the limitation in the eighth section? What law does the President or Commodore Paulding violate, in arresting upon the high seas enterprises of this sort? What constitutional feature or clause is violated? Where is the restriction upon the President, or upon the naval officer? There is a fundamental difference between us. He has first got to show the law for it. And, sir, I say, and without the fear of contradiction, that the President of the United States cannot use the Army or the Navy or the militia, but in the enforcement of judicial proceedings, under our intra-territorial laws, with the exceptions I shall allude to. On the high seas, under particular laws, he is empowered to use the Navy. This is as a police; but under intra-territorial laws the President cannot use any of the military forces of this country but in subordination to, and in advancing legal process, and they are then called in as the posse comitatus to aid your marshal; and this is done by authority of law. This power was not given to the President, until 1795, and I call the attention of the House to that act. It is as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, and as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress."

That is the act which empowers him to call forth the militia. In 1807 another law was passed, empowering him to use the Army and Navy in the same cases only. Apart from these laws, the President has no power, intra-territorially, to use the Army or the Navy, with two exceptions: that is, to aid in putting down insurrection when called upon by the Legislature, or, in the absence of the Legislature, by the Executive of a State, which is provided in the first section of the act of 1795. These are the only cases under our law.

Now, when the gentleman speaks of any limitation, or when he asks me where is the limitation, I say, show the grant of the authority. The position I take is, that you first have got to show the grant. It is for you to show the authority. Now, then, the only authority the gentleman cited was the latter part of this eighth section, in which it is said, "And also for the purpose of preventing the carrying on," &c.

But, sir, I do not give the construction he does to the word "prevent," or carrying on. What does it mean? The gentleman argues that it means "break up," "to go out upon the high seas and arrest." I say "prevent" does not mean that. "Prevent," from prevenio, to come before; to stand in front. In the marine league, if you please, to prevent; to stay back; stand in front; prevent these excursions or enterprises from going or being carried on from the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. That is my construction.

Now, sir, as to carrying on, let us see if I am carried out and sustained by contemporaneous understanding of this word. In 1794, Congress passed a law, entitled "An act to prohibit the carrying on of the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country. 'Carrying on!'" And in this very act the vessels of the United States are not empowered to make any seizure; there is to be no confiscation except intra-territorially. I read from the first section, speaking of those ships which shall thus be engaged. It is as follows:

"And shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted and condemned in any of the circuit courts, or district courts for the district!"

not where the ship shall be found upon the high seas, but in the district—

"where the said ship or vessel may be found and seized."

That is, within the jurisdiction of the United States; and this act was entitled "An act to prevent and prohibit the carrying on," &c. Now, sir, if contemporaneous interpretation of words in laws is allowed, I say I am justified in my inference that the Legislature meant by "carrying on" the same thing in the one case as in the other. The title of the act of 1794 was "to prohibit the carrying on," and there was no extra-territorial power conferred upon the naval officers. I have been asked if the President cannot arrest an offender against our laws upon the high seas. In cases of piracy; in case of the slave trade—for at this time that is declared piracy; in case of murder upon the high seas in American bottoms—all these cases are provided for by law. Hence my proposition, I maintain, is incontrovertible, that the President cannot use the Army and the naval forces of this country, unless by legal authority expressed.

Another reason for my construction is, that the part relied upon, that no extra-territorial authority was contemplated by this latter part of the eighth section of the act of 1818, empowers the President to use the Army and militia just as much as the Navy. Now, sir, I ask this House—I ask the country—if, under that law, the Executive can use the Navy for the purpose of breaking up or preventing the carrying on of expeditions beyond the marine league, why he cannot, for the same purpose, transfer the whole Army and militia of this country into the interior of the foreign country, or wherever the expedition may go? Has not the President as much right to send the Army and the militia to pursue them, as he has the Navy? Has he, then, the right to send our entire military force into the interior of Nicaragua, or England it may be, if he cannot arrest the carrying on short of that point, provided the opposing party in any country consents? Some of Walker's party are in possession of Fort Castillo. Well, has the President a right to send an army up there to dispossess them? If so, the President of the United States may make war, or engage in any foreign war by the consent of one of the parties. All that will be necessary is for some of our people to take sides with one party, and then for the President, with the consent of the other, to send the Army, the Navy, and the militia, to prevent the "carrying on" of such interference. I tell gentlemen this is dangerous doctrine; there is no law for it. I stand on the laws. I am here to defend the Constitution of my country. I am not here the advocate of the breakers of law, in any sense of the word. It is you who would break the law, under pretense of arresting offenders. I say that this eighth section never, in my judgment, contemplated any such power. If the President has the right to send the Navy beyond the marine league, he has got the right to send the Army after the expedition into the interior of the country, consent being given, as I have stated. No gentleman can get out of that.

But, Mr. Chairman, I find that my time is passing. I took occasion, when I addressed the committee before, to express some opinions as to the law of nations. Some gentlemen have replied to them. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Groesbeck] cited, the other day, the authority of Judge Story, in the Mariana Flora case, in which the dictum occurred that the United States ships may seize ships, commanded by American citizens, that are engaged in violating our law, outside of the marine league. But that was a case of piracy, very unfortunately for the gentleman who has cited that case.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Congress has granted special power in such cases.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Yes, Congress has given the power to seize on the high seas any vessel violating our law in such cases; and if Judge Story maintained anything else he has not cited any cases. And I still call for the case. I state, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, that this case of Paulding is, in my recollection, the first case of the kind in the country. I defied the production of a case. We have been here ten days, and no case has yet been produced. This is a new case, and we should settle principles as we go. Constitutional liberty, the rights of the people of this country, demand the settlement of these principles aright.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Montgomery] cited, yesterday, what he called international law, to show that it was the duty of the Government of the United States to restrain its citizens. I wish to say, in passing, that that portion of Vattel which the gentleman from Pennsylvania cited, refers to good neighborhood and to comity between neighboring States. I agree with every word of it. But in no case there cited, is it the duty of this or any other Government to go out into the territory of other nations to arrest its citizens or subjects offending there. The doctrine he cited is applicable to this case. If, on our northern borders, citizens of the United States go over and steal and commit robbery and violence in Canada, and come back here, and if we nourish and protect and guard them, that principle of law requires that we should restore the stolen property and punish the offender. I subscribe to every word of it.

But does that doctrine apply to this case? Now I lay down another position as being consistent with the law of nations, and I say that there is no power in the Government of the United States, nor does the law of nations require us to prevent American citizens, either by one, two, a dozen, or a hundred, from quitting this country, and going to other countries, and there joining the enemy of any party at peace with us.

Now, that covers the case. I am sustained in it by what I recognize to be the highest authority in this country. Would that my time allowed me to go more into detail! But I desire to call the attention of the committee to the opinion of Daniel Webster on this subject. In reply to the position assumed yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will read what Mr. Webster, in his correspondence with Lord Ashburton, in 1842, says:

"Whatever duties or relations that law (the law of nations) creates between the sovereign and his subject, can be enforced and maintained only within the realm, or proper possessions or territory, of the sovereign."

If you catch the offender inside, then you may punish him.

"There may be quite as just a prerogative right to the property of subjects as to their personal services, in an exigency of the State; but no Government thinks of controlling, by its own laws, property of its subjects situated abroad—much less does any Government think of entering the territory of another Power for the purpose of seizing such property, and applying it to its own uses. As laws, the prerogatives of the Crown of England have no obligation on persons or property domiciled or situated abroad."

Now, when citizens of the United States abjure their country, leave it, change their allegiance and domicile, and go to Nicaragua or elsewhere, there is no duty whatever resting on this Government to arrest them or punish them.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. That is certainly true as applicable to property. But would it cover the case of a man who attacks the sovereignty itself? When a man goes into another country to attack its sovereignty, can the sovereignty of that country be set up as shielding and protecting him who is attempting to destroy it?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not set up the sovereignty of Nicaragua. I do not occupy that ground. I say that this Government has got no right to go there after men who were citizens of this country after they have parted with their allegiance; and Mr. Webster says that it is not incumbent on this country, by the law of nations, to do it. Nicaragua has got no embodied sovereignty at this time. She is the theater of factions. The only legitimately elected President of that Republic, by the popular vote, is William Walker. I assert that without fear of contradiction. The only legitimately elected President of that country is William Walker. He would, in my judgment, have been there to-day as secure in his place, and in the affections of the people, as our Chief Magistrate is here, if it had not been for the illegal, unconstitutional conduct of Commander Davis. Without the authority of law, Commander Davis compelled him to surrender. Gentlemen say that he was rescued. Walker never gave up the Granada, his own flag-ship, until the United States guns were leveled at her. To-day, but for the interposition of the officers of this Government, Walker would have been, in my judgment, as secure in the affections of the people there as our President is in ours.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The gentleman will have no objection, I presume, to a resolution for sending Walker back, and allowing him to test the affections of the people of Nicaragua. I will vote for that.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Certainly not. I want him sent back, and I stated so in the beginning; but it is what the Government, I am afraid, does not intend to do. It was to prevent this that Commander Davis, last spring, arrested him and brought him to this country; and it was to prevent this that Commodore Paulding has repeated a similar outrage. No, sir. He is first arrested, shorn of his arms, sent to this country, and turned loose, charged as being an offender against our country, and never tried. Can mockery upon outrage be more monstrous?

I said then, and I take occasion to repeat, that the act of Commodore Paulding was robbery and kidnapping. This some gentlemen expressed their regret at having heard. What is robbery? Webster, in his dictionary, among other definitions, says it is "to take by violence and oppression." Did not Commodore Paulding take Walker by violence and oppression? "To strip unlawfully." Did not Paulding strip him of his arms and his property, and send him to this country? Was it not done unlawfully? The President of the United States said, just as I said before I thought he would, that it was unlawfully done. "Unlawfully stripped." By the definition of your great lexicographer, and by the definition of every man, if he was unlawfully stripped, then it was robbery. And I say that restitution should be made. Send him back just as you found him, with all his men, with all his arms, and with all his provisions. That is all I ask you to do. It is all William Walker asks this country to do, and he will show this country whether he has the affections of the people there or not. Sir, for shame's sake, I ask this American Congress not to come here and assert the principle that Walker has committed a violation of our laws, and that he was rescued out of mercy. He feels no obligations for any such mercy. Just as the East Indians said when Hastings offered them the mercy of the British forces, "save us from such friends." I presume Walker would repeat the same. He wants none of your mercy.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I desire not to interrupt the gentleman, but I wish to know if he defines this to be robbery?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have defined it to be robbery.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I should like the gentleman to tell me if robbery must not be committed with felonious intent, and whether this act was committed with felonious intent?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What the gentleman states is, in one sense, robbery. It is legal robbery. I did not say legal robbery, I said robbery.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. What kind of robbery?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Robbery is the unlawful stripping of another. That is robbery; and all the medals that you may grant to Commodore Paulding, if melted and spread out to their utmost capacity, will not make a coating large enough and broad enough to hide the enormity of the deed. The spot will stand there as a stain upon the national escutcheon, unless it be wiped out by that restitution which alone can redress the wrong. You may say "out," but it will not out.

What says Webster is kidnapping? He says, among other definitions, it is "to forcibly carry away any person whatsoever from his own country or State, into another." Did not Commodore

Paulding do that? Walker was legally naturalized; he was the legally elected President of Nicaragua. That is his country. He has been seized and forcibly carried away, and brought into this country. That, by the definition which I have quoted, is kidnapping. You cannot wipe that out. You have got to justify it as being legally done. The President of the United States says it was illegally done.

But I must hasten on. Upon the subject of the law of nations touching the duties of one nation towards another in the restraint of its citizens or subjects, in their conduct towards others, I affirm that it is in no way the duty of any nation to prevent the migration of its people to the other, even if they migrate with the view of joining the enemies of that nation. In other words, it is not the duty of this country, by the law of nations, to prevent its citizens from quitting this country with a view of taking sides in foreign wars, if, in quitting, they renounce their allegiance to this country. This whole doctrine is ably and lucidly set forth in Mr. Webster's letter to M. de Bocanegra, which I have before me. Mr. Bocanegra first addressed Mr. Webster when Secretary of State, on the 12th of May, 1842, upon the subject of the violation of our neutrality towards Mexico, by what he called invasion, from the United States. I read part of what he said, in which he sets forth his complaint:

"The Mexican Government entertained so high an opinion of the force of the Government of the United States, and of its power to restrain those, its subjects, from violating the religious faith of treaties solemnly concluded between it and other nations, and from committing hostilities against such nations in time of peace, that it cannot easily comprehend how those persons have been able to evade the punishment decreed against them by the laws of the United States themselves, and to obtain that quiet impunity which incessantly encourages them to continue their attacks. It is well worthy of remark, that no sooner does the Mexican Government, in the exercise of its rights, which it cannot and does not desire to renounce, prepare means to recover possessions usurped from it, than the whole population of the United States, especially in the southern States, is in commotion; and, in the most public manner, a large portion of them is turned upon Texas, in order to prevent the rebels from being subjected by the Mexican arms, and brought back to proper obedience.

"Could proceedings more hostile on the part of the United States have taken place had that country been at war with the Mexican Republic? Could the insurgents of Texas have obtained a cooperation more effective or more favorable to their interests? Certainly not. The civilized world looks on with amazement, and the Mexican Government is filled with unspeakable regret, as it did hope and had a right to hope, that, living in peace with the United States, your Government would preserve our territory from the invasions of your own subjects."

In a previous part of the same letter he says:

"It is, however, notorious that the insurgent colonists of that integral part of the territory of the Mexican Republic would have been unable to maintain their prolonged rebellion without the aid and the efficient sympathies of citizens of the United States, who have publicly raised forces in their cities and towns; have fitted out vessels in their ports and laden them with munitions of war, and have marched to commit hostilities against a friendly nation under the eyes and with the knowledge of the authorities, to whom are intrusted the fulfillment of the law."

To this, Mr. Webster replied as follows, on the 8th of July, 1842:

"The revolution in Texas, and the events connected with it, and springing out of it, are Mr. De Bocanegra's principal topics; and it is in relation to these that his complaint is founded. His Government, he says, flatters itself that the Government of the United States has not promoted the insurrection in Texas, favored the usurpation of its territory, or supplied the rebels with vessels, ammunition, and money. If Mr. De Bocanegra intends this as a frank admission of the honest and cautious neutrality of the Government of the United States in the contest between Mexico and Texas, he does that Government justice, and no more than justice; but if the language be intended to intimate an opposite and a reproachful meaning, that meaning is only the more offensive for being insinuated rather than distinctly avowed."

Again:

"In the events leading to the actual result of these hostilities, the United States had no agency, and took no part. Its Government had, from the first, abstained from giving aid or succor to either party. It knew its neutral obligations, and fairly endeavored to fulfill them all."

"Mr. De Bocanegra's complaint is twofold. First, that citizens of the United States have supplied the rebels in Texas with ammunition, arms, vessels, money, and recruits; have publicly raised forces in their cities, and fitted out vessels in their ports, loaded them with munitions of war, and marched to commit hostilities against a friendly nation, under the eye, and with a knowledge, of the public authorities. In all this, Mr. De Bocanegra appears to forget that, while the United States are at peace with Mexico, they are also at peace with Texas; that both stand on the same footing of friendly nations; that since 1823, the United States have regarded Texas as an independent sovereignty, as much as Mexico, and that trade and commerce with citizens of a Government at war with Mexico cannot, on that account, be regarded as an intercourse by which assistance and succor are given to Mexican rebels."

"Acknowledging Texas to be an independent nation, the Government of the United States, of course, allows and encourages lawful trade and commerce between the two countries. If articles contraband of war be found mingled with this commerce, while Mexico and Texas are belligerent States, Mexico has the right to intercept the transit of such articles to her enemy. This is the common right of all belligerents, and belongs to Mexico in the same extent as to other nations. But Mr. De Bocanegra is quite well aware that it is not the practice of nations to undertake to prohibit their own subjects, by previous laws, from trafficking in articles contraband of war. Such trade is carried on at the risk of those engaged in it, under the liabilities and penalties prescribed by the law of nations, or by particular treaties. If it be true, therefore, that citizens of the United States have been engaged in a commerce by which Texas, an enemy of Mexico, has been supplied with arms and munitions of war, the Government of the United States, nevertheless, was not bound to prevent it, could not have prevented it, without a manifest departure from the principles of neutrality, and is in no way answerable for the consequences."

"There can be no doubt at all that, for the last six years, the trade in articles contraband of war between the United States and Mexico, has been greater than between the United States and Texas. It is probably greater at this moment. Why has not Texas a right to complain of this? For no reason, certainly, but because the permission to trade, or the actual trading, by the citizens of a Government, in articles contraband of war, is not a breach of neutrality."

"The second part of Mr. De Bocanegra's complaint is thus stated: 'No sooner does the Mexican Government, in the exercise of its rights, which it cannot and does not desire to renounce, prepare means to recover a possession usurped from it, than the whole population of the United States, especially in the southern States, is in commotion; and, in the most public manner, a large portion of them is directed upon Texas.'

"And how does Mr. De Bocanegra suppose that the Government of the United States can prevent, or is bound to undertake to prevent, the people from thus going to Texas? This is emigration—the same emigration, though not under the same circumstances, which Mexico invited to Texas before the revolution. These persons, so far as is known to the Government of the United States, repair to Texas, not as citizens of the United States, but as ceasing to be such citizens, and as changing at the same time, their allegiance and their domicile. Should they return, after having entered into the service of a foreign State, still claiming to be citizens of the United States, it will be for the authorities of the United States Government to determine how far they have violated the municipal laws of the country, and what penalties they have incurred. The Government of the United States does not maintain, and never has maintained, the doctrine of the perpetuity of national allegiance; and surely Mexico maintains no such doctrine; because her actually existing Government, like that of the United States, is founded on the principle that men may throw off the obligations of that allegiance to which they are born. The Government of the United States from its origin has maintained legal provisions for the naturalization of such subjects of foreign States as may choose to come hither, make their home in the country, and renouncing their former allegiance, and complying with certain stated requisitions, to take upon themselves the character of citizens of this Government. Mexico herself, in laws granting equal facilities to the naturalization of foreigners. On the other hand, the United States have not passed any law restraining their own citizens, native or naturalized, from leaving the country, and forming political relations elsewhere. Nor do other Governments, in modern times, attempt any such thing. It is true that there are Governments which assert the principle of perpetual allegiance; yet, even in cases where this is not rather a matter of theory than practice, the duties of this supposed continuing allegiance are left to be demanded of the subject himself, when within the reach of the power of his former Government, and as exigencies may arise, and are not attempted to be enforced by the imposition of previous restraint, preventing men from leaving their country."

Again:

"The chief Executive Magistrate, as well as functionaries in every other department, is restrained and guided by the Constitution and the laws of the land. Neither the Constitution, nor the law of the land, nor principles known to the usages of modern States, authorize him to interdict lawful trade between the United States and Texas, or to prevent, or attempt to prevent, individuals from leaving the United States for Texas, or any other foreign country."

"If such individuals enter the service of Texas, or any other foreign State, the Government of the United States no longer holds over them the shield of its protection. They must stand or fall in their newly-assumed character, and according to the fortunes which may befall it."

Sir, who said that? Daniel Webster, who was as learned in the law, State, constitutional and national, as any man that ever lived upon the face of the earth. He was known, sir, as the Great Constitutional Expounder. I am not here to defend all the opinions he ever uttered; but I believe that he was quite Federal enough in all his constructions. He was a man whose massive intellect, like a huge lens, gathering every passing ray of light, brought the whole to a focal point of intense clearness and brightness upon every subject to which it was directed. Every question to which his attention was directed never passed from his hands without being thoroughly explained and made perfectly clear to any intellect. That is what he says; that neither Congress nor the President has a right to prevent, or attempt to prevent, citizens from migrating from this country, even with a view of joining the enemies of a party at peace with us. They have a right to abjure their allegiance. Mr. Waddy Thompson, our Minister to Mexico at that time, in a circular letter, uses similar language. I cannot read all of it; but he says, on June 6, 1842:

"Our own laws upon this subject, which embody to the fullest extent the principles of the law of nations, only authorize the prevention of armed and organized expeditions. It is not permitted, nor is it to be expected, that we should forbid emigration; nor is it a violation of the obligations of neutrality, that the country to which our people choose to emigrate, happens to be at war with another, with which we are friendly. The citizens and subjects of all countries have gone to Texas and joined its armies. The only difference is that a larger number of the people of the United States has gone to that country. Does the number alter the principle? If one may go, may not ten? If ten, why not a hundred, or a thousand? The principle is the same. An American citizen, for example, is about to embark from New Orleans, and he has his rifle, bowie-knife, and pistols. Have our authorities any power to stop him? If there are ten or a hundred, the case is the same. I go further. If they admit they are going to Texas, and intend to become citizens, and to join the armies of that country, it cannot be prevented. All that could be said to them would be, 'if you go to Texas and become citizens, you have a right to do so, to change your allegiance, and to discharge all the new duties which such a change of allegiance may exact; but you are no longer a citizen of the United States.' If a regular military expedition is fitted out, then it is not only our right, but our high duty, to prevent it. In all the revolutionary movements of the South American Republics, including Mexico, large numbers of our people joined the insurgents. It has always been so, and always will be."

Again, in the same paper, he says, in relation to the charge of citizens of the United States furnishing arms to the Texans:

"I assert that such trade is no violation of neutrality; that it has never been so regarded by any respectable writer on public law; and that it is a well-settled principle, that to send articles contraband of war to a belligerent, is no violation of neutrality; the only penalty being the forfeiture of the articles themselves."

On the 13th July, 1842, Mr. Webster acknowledges the receipt of a copy of this circular, in a letter to Mr. Thompson. In that letter, the only comment he makes upon the circular is in these words:

"You have not spoken of it (referring to a previous circular of Buchanan's, complaining of what he called a violation of our neutrality toward Mexico) in terms too strong in your circular to the members of the diplomatic corps."

Now, sir, in the opinion of these men, I say that our law, as it now exists, does not prevent citizens of the United States, with arms in their hands, going into any country they please, provided they do not go in military organization. Military expeditions are prevented. Military expeditions are known; there is no mistaking them. Our laws say that they should be prevented, and I say so too, if it can be done within our own jurisdiction. But I say that General Walker had a right to go to Nicaragua. Those one hundred and fifty men had a right to go there. It was no military organization.

Some gentleman has said that General Walker sailed in fraud of our laws. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect, I think that was a mistake. General Walker's expedition was inspected. His ship was inspected. He got a regular clearance. He had a right to it. He went out upon the high seas with just as clear a manifest as any of our ships sailing the ocean. Mr. Webster has affirmed, as just read, that there is no power in the President, in the naval officers, or in the courts, under our laws as they were and still exist, to prevent the emigration of our people to other countries. That is all I affirm. Armed expeditions should be prevented.

I repeat, sir, in conclusion, as I have got but a few minutes left, that I am not here against the neutrality laws, as far as they embody the well-settled laws of nations. I am for having them clearly and distinctly expressed. Armed expeditions, organized against the law of nations, I am against; but when American citizens see fit to change their allegiance, and to go, with rifle and bowie knife in hand, I say that they have a right to do so. Yes, sir, they have a constitutional right to bear arms in this country and to carry them wherever they see fit to go. They cannot use our soil on which to organize military expeditions. If they do so, stop them. If Walker committed a wrong, let him be tried. If his men violated the law, let them be tried, but do not add insult to wrong, mockery to outrage. Do not commit this great wrong upon him if he be not guilty. If you accuse him, try him; and if found not guilty, redress the wrong as you ought. My opinion is, that he is innocent; that he has violated no law. I am not here as his eulogist. History will take care of him.

Believing that he has violated no law, but that the law has been grossly violated against him, and vindicating, as I do, the constitutional rights of every man in our jurisdiction, whether citizen or not, I say, sir, that if he be guilty, try him; but do not interfere with the rights of any man upon the bare assumption of his being an offender, without a trial. His guilt has to be proved and judicially ascertained before he can be justly assailed as a criminal.

Mr. Chairman, I stated, and repeat now, that Walker's government in Nicaragua was recognized by this. Mr. Wheeler, our minister, recognized the Rivas Government, and recognized Walker as President. The representative of that Government here was recognized by this Government; and this Government did not, sir—and I want this House to know it—recognize any other than the Government under which Walker held office, until after he sailed on this expedition. We were at peace with no authority in Nicaragua but his. Let no man say that I am in favor of violating national faith; let no man put me in the position of speaking lightly of the national faith or the national flag. Gentlemen cannot occupy that ground. I stand upon it myself. The stars and stripes, whenever they wave over a gallant Navy in defense of the rights of our citizens, and in defense of national law, I shall hail with delight, and be ready to respond, from the bottom of my heart, in praise of its chivalrous officers and men.

But, sir, the members of this House have been unfortunate in alluding to General Jackson, and to the case of Captain Ingraham. General Jackson himself took possession of Florida. He was, if you please, a grand filibuster himself. That was illegal. His error was on virtue's side. He erred for the country, and for the people's interests. But it remained to Commander Davis and Commodore Paulding, for the first time in our country's history, to bear that gallant flag, not in defense of men of their own blood, of their own flesh, of their own race, who had changed their allegiance; but it was the honor of these officers to bear the flag of their country against the interests of their country. It is the special honor of Commodore Paulding to have done what he did in anticipation of what a British commodore was about to do. He boasts of the deed, and says if he had not done it the British would have done it. His glory, as I understand it, is, that he stepped in and did the British work. When the American flag is prostituted to perform the work of a British officer, I cannot commend the deed. Why, sir, when Davis took this same man, a British commander was alongside. If it is coming to this, that our Navy in Central America is to do British work and British bidding, I say it is time they were called home. It was not such work as this that our daring commanders did in the last war, when they elevated the American Navy to that height of glory that it has attained, and of which we may all be justly proud. That was achieved by fighting the British, and opposing British policy.

I am for maintaining the same American policy against British policy that our Navy then maintained. I am for maintaining the laws of our country, and against aggressions of all sorts. I stand here to-day upon a general principle which involves the rights of American citizens. I am here also to defend the American flag, whether upon land or upon sea, as long as it is borne aloft in defense of these rights. According to these principles no citizen of the United States, or foreigner, within our jurisdiction, can be deprived of his life, of his liberty, or his property, but by the judgment of his peers and the laws of the land. Upon these principles I stand or I fall.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Chairman, whenever it shall be in order, I shall offer to the House the following resolution, which covers the ground that I propose to discuss:

Resolved, That a select committee, to consist of — members, be appointed by the Speaker, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of providing for the acquisition of territory either in the Central or South American States, to be colonized with colored persons from the United States who are now free, or who may hereafter become free, and who may be willing to settle in such territory as a dependency of the United States, with ample guarantees of their personal and political rights.

It was remarked by a gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] the other day, on this floor, that he had hoped and believed that this question would be discussed and disposed of without reference to the subject of slavery, because, he said, there were no slaves in Central America. The inquiry was made immediately, by many around me, "How long will it be before there are slaves there?" This inquiry shows, what is almost universally felt to be true, that the slavery question is at the bottom of this whole movement. There is a party in this country who go for the extension of slavery; and these predatory incursions against our neighbors are the means by which territory is to be seized, planted with slavery, annexed to this Union, and, in combination with the present slaveholding States, made to dominate this Government, and the entire continent; or, failing in the policy of annexation, to unite with the slave States in a southern slaveholding Republic. I believe that there are those who entertain such a purpose. I am opposed to the whole scheme, and to every part of it; and, in order to oppose it successfully, I think we should recur to the plans cherished by the great men who founded this Republic. I think we ought to put it out of the power of any body of men to plant slavery anywhere on this continent, by taking immediate steps to give to all of these countries that require it, and especially to the Central American States, the power to sustain free institutions under stable governments; and, as one method of doing this, we might plant those countries with a class of men who are worse than useless to us, who would prove themselves to be of immense advantage to those countries, who would attract the wealth and energy of our best men to aid and direct them in developing the incredible riches of those regions, and thus open them to our commerce, and the commerce of the whole world. I refer to our enfranchised slaves, all of that class who would willingly embrace the offer to form themselves into a colony under the protection of our flag, and the guarantee of the Republic of every personal and political right necessary to their safety and prosperity.

What I propose is not new; it is bottomed on the reasoning and recommendation of Mr. Jefferson. Speaking of a proposition, similar in many respects, urged by him upon the Legislature of his native State, he says:

"It was, however, found that the public mind would not yet bear the proposition, nor will it bear it even at this day; yet the day is not far distant when it must bear it and adopt it, or worse will follow. Nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate, than that these people (the negroes) are to be free; nor is it less certain that the two races, equally free, cannot live in the same Government. Nature, habit, opinion, have drawn indelible lines of distinction between them. It is still in our power to direct the process of EMANCIPATION and DEPORTATION, and in such slow degree as that the evil will wear off insensibly, and their place be pari passu filled up by free white laborers. If, on the contrary, it is left to force itself on, human nature must shudder at the prospect held up. We should in vain look for an example in the Spanish deportation or deletion of the Moors."

The time has ripened for the execution of Mr. Jefferson's plan. By adopting it, we may relieve ourselves of a people who are a burden to us; give to them an amount of happiness and comfort they can never realize here, where they are treated as a degraded class; reinvigorate the feeble people of the southern Republics, and open up to the enterprise of our merchants the untold wealth of the intertropical region, containing a greater amount of productive land than all the balance of the continent; put a stop to the African slave trade, which is created and kept up by the demand for tropical productions; by supplying that demand by the labor of the only class of freemen capable of exertion in that climate. I make this proposition to meet, oppose, and defeat that which seeks by violence to reestablish slavery, reopen the African slave trade, subject those regions, in Walker's own language, "to military rule," and exclude from them the people of the northern States. I shall discuss and compare these propositions as fully as the time limited will allow me.

Mr. RANDOLPH, in one of his most celebrated speeches in the Senate, addressing himself to Mr. Calhoun, said:

"Sir, I know there are gentlemen, not only from the southern, but the northern States, who think that this unhappy question—for such it is—of negro slavery, which the Constitution has vainly attempted to blink by not using the term, should never be brought into public notice, more especially into that of Congress, and most especially here. Sir, with every due respect for the gentlemen who think so, I differ with them temo caelo. Sir, it is a thing which cannot be hid. It is not a dry rot that you can cover with a carpet until the house tumbles about your ears. You might as well try to hide a volcano in full operation. It cannot be hid; it is a cancer on your face, and must not be tampered with by quacks, who never saw the disease or the patient, and prescribe across the Atlantic. It must be, if you will, let alone.

"But no, sir; the politico-religious quacks, like the quack in medicine and in everything else, will hear of nothing but his nostrum; all is to be forced—nothing can be trusted to time or to nature. The disease has run its course; it has run its course in the northern States, it is beginning to run its course in Maryland. The natural death of slavery is the unprofitableness of its most expensive labor. It is also beginning in the meadow and grain country of Virginia—among those people there who have no staple that can pay for slave labor."

He then points his conclusion in a way to make it stick in the memories of the masters of slaves, to whom he addressed himself:

"The moment the labor of the slave ceases to be profitable to the master, or very soon after it has reached that stage, if the slave will not run away from the master, the master will run away from the slave."

Mr. Chairman, I am Mr. Randolph's proselyte; he was no Abolitionist, although aware that slavery was sapping the very foundations of the free institutions of his country—a cancer on the face, which, unless removed, would eat into the vitals of the Republic. I concur in his opinion, that the master must run away from his slaves, unless they run away from him. Unhappily for the slave States, many of their enterprising young men leave their native land for those States where individual ability and exertion are sufficient to confer wealth and eminence; and all of that oppressed class who are compelled to labor with their naked hands, and struggle for existence in competition with the monopolizing slave power that holds the soil, and bands together, by a common interest, the capital, the intelligence, and influence of the order controlling the government of the Commonwealth to make it paramount, would also fly, if they had the means of flight, or a spot on earth they could call their own to receive them. Although the time has not yet come when the masters are ready to run away from their slaves, it will doubtless come, if ever that great mass of freemen who feel the weight of the institution pressing them to the earth, should have the means of reaching homesteads in happier regions, where their labor might render them independent. Can any condition be more lamentable for a State than that which makes it the obvious interest of the mass of its free population to abandon it? and if poverty prevents this desertion, the cause of detention, constantly increasing, must in the end grow into a frightful calamity.

Every statesman who has looked into the condition of the slave States, has always found it full of difficulties. Mr. Randolph's solution does not end them, unless we go a step further. Where would the slaves go if they could run away? The North may receive an absconding straggler here and there, but what States would receive five million of slaves? or how would the runaways be anywhere provided for? The free States which have put an interdiction, so far away as remote Oregon, upon the admission of free blacks, even in the stunted number which might come from the limited emancipation permitted in the South, would hardly receive millions upon a general jail delivery. Nor can the masters run away from their slaves, unless the North is ready to become a St. Domingo; nor emancipate them en masse without making it a St. Domingo.

Mr. Randolph had a grave meaning in the alternatives he suggests for the riddance of slavery, although its strong sense, as usual with him, is pointed with sarcasm. His will shows how the slaves were to run away from their masters. That testament delivers a practical lesson to his State, more pregnant with sage advice than any ever received from his eloquent lips, on which she hung with such rapture.

The first and second bequests read thus:

"1. I give and bequeath to my slaves their freedom, heartily regretting that I have ever been the owner of one.

"2. I give to my executors a sum not exceeding eight thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to transport and settle said slaves to and in some other State or Territory of the United States, giving to all above the age of forty not less than ten acres of land each."

No man ever more thoroughly understood the interest, or more filially studied the heart of Virginia, than John Randolph. The words I have read will one day be embodied in a statute of the State.

Washington had led the way in this mode of deliverance, manumitting all his slaves by will; and this was in pursuance of what long before he said the interests of Maryland and Virginia demanded. In his letter to Sir John Sinclair, in reference to these States, he said: "Gradual abolition," "nothing is more certain, they must have, and at a period not remote." It seems, however, from an earlier letter to La Fayette, that he contemplated, with peculiar pleasure, the idea of their enfranchisement. He says to the Marquis:

"Your late purchase of an estate in Cayenne, with a view of emancipating the slaves on it, is a generous and noble proof of your humanity. Would to God a like spirit might diffuse itself generally into the minds of the people of this country!"

He did not expect this at once, for he adds:

"To set the slaves afloat at once, would, I really believe, be productive of much inconvenience and mischief; but by degrees it might, and assuredly ought, to be effected, and that by legislation."

The legislation resulted differently, as is shown in the closing passage of Mr. Jefferson's will, in relation to the slaves, which his incumbered estate enabled him to dispose of. It is in these words:

"I give them their freedom, and earnestly request of the Legislature of Virginia a confirmation of the bequest of freedom to these servants, with permission to remain in this State, where their families and connections are, as an additional instance of the favor of which I have received so many manifestations in my life, and for which I now give them my last solemn and dutiful thanks."

The "gradual abolition" contemplated by Washington had, before Mr. Jefferson's death, made so large a class of free negroes as to endanger the safety of the white race by inciting formidable insurrections among the slaves, besides producing the lesser inconveniences apprehended. Hence the law prohibiting manumission without the removal of the emancipated slaves from the State. Mr. Randolph's love for his own State was so great that he set an example of an exodus by sending his tribe of freed blacks beyond the confines of Virginia, at the cost of much mischief to another State. By the legislation of many free States the intrusion of such emigration was soon prevented; and it may now be asserted with truth, that the laws of the free and the slave States combine to perpetuate slavery! for where is the freed man to go? A few rich masters provide the means to return their bondsmen to Africa; and recently some small parties embarked to Mexico, to throw themselves upon the humanity of its semi-barbarous people. There is no alternative but to submit to expulsion, or to refuse the boon of freedom. There existed at least a half million manumitted slaves before the proscriptive laws were passed at the North or South. In the latter section, where the intercourse of the enfranchised and enslaved of the same race is pregnant with danger, measures are in progress to reduce all to the condition of slavery. Laws have been passed in some of the slave States providing that the freed may subject themselves again to servitude, if they can find a master. During the summer and fall another step was taken in this direction by large meetings in Virginia, praying the Legislature to authorize a sweeping sale of all free blacks by auction—to reduce the entire race within the State, however slightly tinctured with negro blood, to bondage.

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the comparative progress of the slave and free States, since the illustrious patriots of Virginia, in the last and most solemn act of their lives, bore their testimony against the institution which now convulses the Confederacy, tending to condemn their policy. There is much in the aspect now given to our affairs by that fatal element, against which their forecast gave warning, to prove that their solicitude to remove it had its root in that sound judgment and devoted love to the country, which made the strongest features of their characters. One great difficulty obstructed these efforts. Emancipation was easy, but the amalgamation of the white and black races was abhorrent, and their existence as equals, under the same Government, was for that reason impossible. They were, nevertheless, resolved to make the experiment of the gradual abolition of slavery, hoping that time would make some outlet to the degraded caste. I believe the existing circumstances on this continent now justify that hope. The attempt of African colonization, to relieve us of the load, has failed. The immense distance, and the barbarous state of the mother country, to which we would restore its improved race that has arisen among us, has paralyzed all the efforts of the benevolent society that has labored so long in vain to form a community in Liberia which would draw hence its kindred emancipated population, and establish a nation there to spread civilization and religion over Africa. Time has shown that the causes which have produced races, never to improve Africa, or to be improved there, but to abandon it and give their vigor and derive their advancement in other climes, are not to be reversed by the best efforts of the best of men. "Westward the star of empire takes its way," is a prophecy which will find its accomplishment within the tropics as well as outside of them on this continent. Liberty and security promote enterprise and industry, and so create that intelligence which brings in its train civilization and Christianity. Africa is a desert, in which every effort to propagate the elements which lead to such results have proved failures; and for ages Africa has ever been "the house of bondage."

As Americans, it is our first interest to take care of this continent, and provide for the races on whose faculties and labor its advancement depends. In my opinion, the door is now open in Central America to receive the enfranchised colored race born amongst us, and which has received, with our language and the habits contracted under our institutions, much that adapts it to sustain a part in giving stability to the institutions copied from ours in the Central American Republics.

Mr. Wells, an American gentleman of high talents and attainments, with a view to promote commercial enterprises originating with a merchant of New York, recently traversed Central America under most favorable auspices, in order to explore its resources and obtain certain mining and commercial privileges from the Government of Honduras. His volume, published at the close of the year 1856, and which gives the condition of the country down to the end of Walker's first invasion, is full of information as to the capabilities of the country, and the posture of the parties that distract it. It shows on what the Liberals, who emancipated the country from Spain, rely for the preservation of its freedom. He was intimate with Cabañas, the late enlightened and most liberal President of Honduras, whose policy he indicates in the brief passages I now read from his book:

"Although as a Spanish American, Cabañas was personally opposed, at the commencement of his administration, to the encouragement of enterprises through which strangers would be likely to obtain a dangerous ascendancy in Central America, he was gradually induced, by the influence of Señors Cacho and Mejia, his Ministers, to dismiss these objections. In the midst of his harassing campaign in Gracias, in the month of July, he found time to turn his attention toward the interoceanic railway project; and to Cabañas should be ascribed the double honor of conquering his inborn prejudices against foreigners, and of giving the principal impulse to an enterprise likely to assume an importance second to none in the present age.

"Actuated by the same laudable intentions, and penetrated with the conviction that only through northern industry and enterprise can the Spanish-American races be raised to a permanent grade of prosperity, Señor Barrundia, then far advanced in years, and frequently referred to in this sketch, as a talented and zealous member of the Liberal party, was dispatched to Washington as the first diplomatic agent ever sent to the United States by Honduras, as a distinct Power. His death at New York, on the 6th of August, of the same year, put an untimely end to the negotiations, and frustrated the dawning hopes of the Liberals."

The precise object aimed at in the negotiation proposed to our President, is made conspicuous in the address of the Minister Barrundia, one of the great and learned men of the country, the last of its revolutionary stock, whose eloquence and wisdom in its councils led the way to the achievement of its independence. His presentation speech uttered the sentiments of the President of Honduras, as well as those of the venerable patriot and statesman and all the liberals he led, who founded that Republic on the basis of our North American Confederacy. Every word of it is pregnant with political meaning to which time will give effect; and the House cannot fail to mark these sentences in the address, and give emphasis to the closing words:

"The mission with which I am charged is perhaps more significant than any which has yet originated in Central America, and its objects are such as are seldom confided to an ordinary legation. It relates to the vital interests of an American people struggling against the antagonism of monarchical principles, which, unfortunately, in some parts of this continent are seeking to change the blessings of liberty and independence for alien protectorates and irresponsible dictatorships."

In a little more than a year afterwards the last words became facts. Carrera, a mestizo, of mixed Spanish and Indian blood, had, years before, by the aid of his Indian allies, made himself Dictator of Guatemala; then turning his force against Cabafias, President of Honduras and chief of the Liberals, he placed Santos Guardiola, another mestizo, in a dictatorship over that State. It is with this latter chieftain that the British Government has negotiated its treaty, resigning the Bay Islands to the so-called Republic, but still holding them under the "alien protectorate" of British institutions. I will read a single page from the lucid sketch given by Mr. Wells's book, which is, in fact, his report to the American merchants who employed him to examine the state of the country, in which they designed to prosecute their commercial enterprises. In this passage he makes an epitome which grasps the whole history.

"It will be seen that the main cause of the devastating wars of Central America, has been the division of the States into irreconcilable parties; one advocating the continuance of the obsolete forms of the Spanish viceroyalty, and the revival of the extinct aristocratical institutions of the colonial period; and the other, envious of the astonishing progress of the United States under a purely republican government, vainly attempting to establish a similar system, and shedding their best blood in the thirty years' struggle to that end.

"Of the patriotic motives of the Liberals, scarcely one among the few native and foreign writers upon the politics of Central America but pay a deserved tribute to their earnest exertions in behalf of their country. An English author includes in the Liberal party some few who had been distinguished men under the monarchy, the greater portions of the legal and medical professions, or, in other words, the elite of the University, who had preferred these studies to that of theology or canons, not so much as a means of support as because they are almost the only careers open to those who reject the ecclesiastical vocation. 'It also numbered many merchants and landed proprietors, supported by a numerous body, composed of the more intelligent artisans and laborers.' Their leaders were men of very decided democratical principles, of unquestionable ability, and, considering the school they were brought up in and the influence that surrounded them, they manifested no small amount of true patriotism and devotedness to their convictions; though, alas! in too many instances, stained with venality and even with deeds of oppression and blood. What they overthrew, and what they accomplished for the State is honorable alike to their talents and their sentiments; and though the limits of a sketch will scarcely admit a due appreciation of it, a cursory view of their achievements, taking into consideration the circumstances of the people, and of the times, will probably excite more wonder, and certainly merits higher praise, than the victories of Alvarado."

"Since Guardiola's usurpation of the supreme power in Honduras, the State has assumed a temporary importance abroad, by the arrangement of a treaty between its Government and that of Great Britain, by which the Central American question was finally settled, the Bay Islands restored to the Republic, and the British protectorate withdrawn from the Mosquito territory. The communication of Señor Alvarado, Honduras's Minister to Great Britain, announcing to his Government the conclusion of the treaty, is dated London, September 15, 1856. The principal feature in the convention was the right accorded to the inhabitants of the Bay Islands to maintain their own municipal government, to be administered by legislative, executive, and judicial officers of their own election; trial by jury in their own courts; freedom of religious belief and worship, public and private; exemption from military service except for their own defense; and from all taxation on real or other property beyond such as may be imposed by their own municipality, and collected for the treasury of the same, and to be applied to the common benefit.

"The stipulations concerning religious freedom and trial by jury are thus forced on Honduras, and furnish the germs from which these eminently Anglo-Saxon ideas must eventually spread to the main land. Under the Federal Republic, the attempt to introduce this gave rise to the sanguinary conflicts between the authorities and the Indians, who then, as now, were incapable of appreciating its benefits. The privileges thus accorded to an integral portion of the State afford the first instance of the establishment in Central America of republican institutions, which are not subject to overthrow at the caprice of temporary rulers."

It seems that our American observer, standing on the spot—however averse to this British obstruction—is obliged to admit that it afforded "the first instance of the establishment in Central America of republican institutions which are not subject to overthrow at the caprice of temporary rulers." But what says our President in reference to this convention? He revolts at it, because, (I read his words:)

"Whilst declaring the Bay Islands to be a free territory, under the sovereignty of Honduras, it deprived that Republic of rights without which its sovereignty over them could scarcely be said to exist. It divided them from the remainder of Honduras, and gave to their inhabitants a separate Government of their own, with legislative, executive, and judicial officers, elected by themselves. It deprived the Government of Honduras of the taxing power in every form, and exempted the people of the islands from the performance of military duty, except for their own exclusive defense. It also prohibited that Republic from erecting fortifications upon them for their protection; thus leaving them open to invasion from every quarter; and, finally, it provided 'that slavery shall not at any time hereafter be permitted to exist therein.'"

This last point is marked by inverted commas in the message, by way of showing that he gives the exact words of the treaty in that clause, which crowns the climax of its obnoxious impositions. It is strange that our President in his enumeration of the shocking guarantees with which England incumbered her surrender of the Bay Islands to the mercy of the dictator, omitted those which were closely associated with, and gave vitality to that interdicting slavery. They were the right of habeas corpus, trial by jury, and freedom of religious belief and worship.

But Mr. Buchanan put his mark on that line of the treaty which excited so much abhorrence in that part of the Senate, which was, and is still laboring to force slavery on Kansas. He "sticks a pin there" and thus tells them, "I join you in making war upon the establishment of Anglo-Saxon institutions in any part of Central America, coupled with the exclusion of slavery, because they will frustrate the design we have formed and sent Walker to execute," and which the latter plainly avows in the following passage of a letter to one of his emissaries embarked with him in the enterprise. In his letter to Goicuria, sent by him as minister to England, he says:

"With your versatility, and, if I may use the term, adaptability, I expect much to be done in England. You can do more than any American could possibly accomplish, because you can make the British Cabinet see that we are not engaged in any scheme for annexation; you can make them see that the only way to cut the expanding and expansive democracy of the North, is by a powerful and compact southern federation based on military principles."

Again he says:

"Tell ——— he must send me the news, and let me know whether 'Cuba must and shall be free' but not for the Yankees, Oh! no! that fine country is not fit for those barbarous Yankees! What would such a psalm-singing set do in the island?"

In his letter to the Hon. C. J. Jenkins, of Georgia, Walker admits that though he did not go to Central America to establish slavery, that measure was the guiding star of his policy after he reached there. He admits, too, that the decree issued with this object in view, was his individual act, and that it was opposed by the whole body of native inhabitants. He asserts, also, that the measure was resorted to by him as part of a system for promoting "the increase of negro slavery on this continent."

Now, whether the President sent his fleet to Nicaragua to protect that State from Walker's attempt, in compliance with the late treaty, or to make a cover for our national honor, and a cover for the enterprise endangered by another fleet hovering on that coast, remains a problem. In one view, the policy contemplated by him is very clear. No man can look at the complexion of the Cabinet with which he is surrounded; at the hardy attempts of every branch of the Government to propagate slavery North and South; at the manifest determination, both of the Senate and the late and the present President, to keep open the Central American dispute with the British Government, making its treaty with Honduras for the exclusion of slavery from the Bay Islands the main difficulty, without seeing that there is a latent purpose of forcing slavery on that region against the will of a majority of the people of the Union, and making the Confederacy submit to a fragment of it, under the threat of flying off.

The purpose of subjecting Central America to slavery has been boldly proclaimed; and the opening of the African slave trade is relied upon to fill up the void in the laboring population which must be made by the war and the expulsion of dangerous classes. Is it not a degradation of the nation which stands on this continent as the first assertor of its freedom and independence, and the great exemplar of popular sovereignty in the world, to have a Chief Magistrate and controlling councils harboring designs which they dare not avow, and seeking by sly intrigues to involve it in a war, to accomplish schemes which the people would spurn with disgust, if promulgated before they became committed in the conflict? I have no doubt my countrymen would regard with just indignation, and resist an attempt by England to turn our flank on the Gulf of Mexico. That she spreads her dominion across this continent, from the Gulf of the St. Lawrence to Vancouver's Island on the Pacific, bringing its pressure to bear upon our whole northern frontier, is as much constraint as can be endured. The nation would be willing to close this century as it began—in hostility with England—rather than submit to encroachment in our southern quarter. For this reason our Government insisted that Great Britain should abandon the assumed protectorate claimed over the coasts of Central America. She relinquished it; but she stipulated with Honduras that the subjects left by her in the Bay Islands should continue to enjoy the free institutions which she had planted there. Our own citizen, Mr. Wells, looking to the establishment of our influence through our institutions in this quarter, hails this step as "the establishment in Central America of republican institutions, which are not to be overthrown at the caprice of temporary rulers."

Can Mr. Buchanan summon hardihood to involve this country in a war to expel the freedom guaranteed to the Bay Islands by the treaty made with the dictator Guardiola, and subject them to his absolute authority? I would rather hope that our Government, if not now, may yet, under another Presidency, extend its influence over the mainland of Central America, by giving its support to maintain Governments there based upon its own republican principles. To do this, we must, like England in the case of the Bay Islands, send our people into the country, protect our merchants in their enterprises there, and make an honest demonstration of the fixed purpose of our Government to build up the prosperity of Central America for its own and our advantage. What could confer more honor on our national character than the acceptance of the proposal which the illustrious patriot Barrundia, as the last act of his life, submitted to our late President, speaking for Cabafias and the wishes (as Mr. Wells and our diplomatic agent, Mr. Squier, give reason to believe) of the people of Honduras. Barrundia says:

"She offers her commodious ports, her salubrious climate, and her great but undeveloped resources, to the aid of this undertaking, and freely offers her rich and fertile country to the enterprise and industry of the American people. Honduras should be forever the friend and sister of the United States, and she looks hopefully to the latter for the support of her liberty and independence. May the eternal Disposer of events link together the people of both by the unalterable tie of interest and future mutual prosperity."

He concludes by repeating:

"The earnest solicitude of Honduras to establish a true and intimate fraternity with the United States, in such form that both nations may have a single interest for the common cause of liberty, and in such manner that Honduras may proceed to develop her latent elements of prosperity, and to improve the advantages of a position eminently favored by nature, without a fear of disturbance for the future, either from civil discord or exterior aggression, should such a fortunate result be attained, Honduras will yet present, in the center of the commercial world, the glorious spectacle of a free and prosperous people sustained by the generosity of the great American Republic."

To what a glorious and benevolent mission was our country called by this invocation of Barrundia, compared with those vile buccaneering expeditions set on foot by a body of filibustering malcontents among us, enemies alike of both Republics! They want to set up a government "under military rule." They want to be associated with the slave States, and exclude "the psalm-singing Yankees." They want to repeal the edict emancipating the slaves in the Central American States and enslave them again. And can any one doubt whether these rapacious propagandists of slavery would hesitate, in case of success, to make themselves amends for their toils, sufferings, and dangers, somewhat as Cortez turned these conquests to account, acquired and held "by military rule?"

Connected with this overture of Barrundia, on the part of Honduras, freely offering "her rich and fertile country (rich in gold and every species of vegetation) to the enterprise and industry of the American people," in return for security from "civil discord and foreign aggression," was another which addressed itself to the enterprising spirit of our great commercial cities. It was the grant of a charter conferring privileges of immense value to be derived from the construction of an inter-oceanic railroad from the Atlantic bay of Honduras to the bay of Fonseca, on the Pacific. Mr. Wells glances at this when he arrives at Amapala, which he mentions as the projected "terminus of the Honduras inter-oceanic railroad, which, commencing on the Caribbean sea, is designed to pass through the beautiful valley of Comagua, a distance of one hundred and sixty-eight miles, and with an average grade, as the reports of the surveys of Mr. E. G. Squier state, of only twenty-eight feet to the mile." He continues:

"While Panama and Nicaragua were early made the field of American enterprise for the establishment of an inter-oceanic communication, it is a little singular that speedier attention was not directed to this route to the Pacific, which is shorter than any other, not excepting that of Tehuantepec, and offers facilities for the construction of an inter-oceanic railroad, not exceeded by any other."

He adds:

"Extraordinary inducements are offered for the furthering of this great enterprise; one of the principal of which is the existence of safe and capacious harbors at either terminus, (an advantage not possessed by the Tehuantepec route), and the comparative small amount of grading and bridging to be done."

In the following paragraph he describes the site of the intended terminus on the Pacific side:

"The first impression on landing at Tigre Island (in the bay on the Pacific side) is its splendid facilities for fortification, and the formation of a great central commercial depot from which to command the trade of the three States bordering on the bay of Fonseca. Its resources fully developed, Amapala might be made the most important port on the Pacific coast, south of San Francisco. In 1850, Mr. E. G. Squier, during his chagreship, forwarded a series of dispatches to the United States Government, in which he advocated the advantages of entering into negotiations with Honduras for the establishment of a naval station at Amapala. Should this plan be adopted, the yearly increasing means of communication between California and the eastern States would soon place a United States squadron within seven days of Washington; with the construction of the contemplated Honduras railroad, and the appliances of telegraphs and steamers, Government orders of the most vital importance to the nation could reach our squadron in the Pacific in three and a half days. The town is now the principal, or rather the only real port where large vessels or steamers may anchor and discharge, on the Pacific coast of the three Republics of Honduras, San Salvador, or Nicaragua."

Our Presidents, of late years, have not been able to lift their vision to look beyond a President-nominating convention. Without having rendered service of any sort to recommend them to the favor of the nation, these conventional aspirants rely on their location in the North, the skill in party tactics acquired by them as subalterns at the drill, and the cunning acquired in the intrigues necessary to give prominence to an eager ambition, without the higher faculties to promote it, fitted these men to become the instruments of a section to defeat the sound, settled policy of the nation. Fillmore was too busy in making covert compliances to ingratiate himself with those pressing from the South to extend the area of slavery North and West, to listen to our Chargé in Central America, when urging the expansion of our national greatness in a direction to have its just control over the continent and the oceans that washed its shores. Pierce was so sunk in his submission to the plotters laboring to crush Kansas under slavery, that the overtures of Barrundia, which would have lifted a whole galaxy of independent States, with open bosom to welcome the enterprise and industry of our countrymen and the influence of our Government, were unheeded. The voice of an empire, uttered by its noblest patriot and statesman, its eloquent philosopher, the scholar who modeled its Government after our own, fell upon his ear as "upon the dull, cold ear of death." But "the day of small things," of enslaved Presidents, of buccaneers, will pass away, and the nation of the New World will resume the attitude which the moral grandeur of the great man who directed its affairs for the first half century, gave it. Then the time will come for a new movement on this continent, which will confer prosperity on these races of men.

Mr. Chairman, it is evident to every man of thought that the freed blacks hold a place in this country which cannot be maintained. Those who have fled to the North are most unwelcome visitors. The strong repugnance of the free white laborer to be yoked with the negro refugee breeds an enmity between races, which must end in the expulsion of the latter. Centuries could not reconcile the Spaniards to the Moors, and although the latter were the most useful people in Spain, their expulsion was the only way to peace. In spite of all that reason or religion can urge, nature has put a badge upon the African, making amalgamation revolting to our race. Centuries have shown that even the aboriginal race of this continent, although approaching our species in every respect more nearly, perish from contiguity with the white man. But I will not argue the point. The law of the North has put its ban upon immigration of negroes into the free States.

In the South, causes more potent still make it impossible that the emancipated blacks can remain there. The multiplication of slaves and freed men of the same caste in the section where the dominant race must become proportionally fewer from emigration, has already compelled the latter to prohibit emancipation within the States, and to seek means of deliverance from the free blacks. The northern States will not receive them; the southern States dare not retain them. What is to be done? What was done with the native population which it was found incompatible with the interests of Georgia and the States southwest of the Ohio, and the States northwest, to indulge with homes within their limits? The United States held it to be a national duty to purchase their lands from them, acquire homes for them in other regions, and to hold out inducements and provide the means for their removal to them. Have not the negroes, born on our soil, who have grown up among us, and although fated to be a burden and obstruction to our progress—yet always in amity and laboring to render service—equal claims upon us with the savages, against whom we have had to fight our way for centuries, resisting all attempts to bring them within the pale of civilization?

The President, in his late message, proposes to gather these savages in colonies, and at an early day raise them to the dignity of forming States, and assuming equality with the States of the Union. The Africans, bred and educated within civilized communities, who speak our language, are listeners at our canvasses, lookers-on at the elections, worshipers in our churches, and constantly witness the processes of improvement in our society, in the field, the work-shop, and every domestic scene—one would think quite as capable of being disciplined in colonies, and fitted to take part in the Government of the Union as the Shawnees, Pottawatomies, Winnebagoes, the Sacs and Foxes, removed from the northwest; or the Cherokees, Choctaws, Creeks, and Seminoles from the southwest; as far as respects the Sioux, Pawnees, Cheyennes, Utahs, Camanches, and Blackfeet, the President might have spared his recommendation until they were caught. I believe the people who constitute this Confederacy will forever scout the idea of blending either Indian or negro States with it. The aboriginal or imported tribes which cannot amalgamate with our race, can never share in its Government in equal sovereignties. In the benevolent design of colonizing the Indians, protecting and aiding their efforts to gain a subsistence by cultivating the soil set apart for them, I most cordially concur; but I think, whatever form of society they may assume, they must always be held as dependencies; not put upon the footing of equality with the States.

And ought not the Government to be equally provident for such portions of the unfortunate race born to slavery, but who, having attained freedom, find that it renders them a burden to those among whom they live—a burden that will not be borne? This is the question which absolute necessity now forces on the consideration of the country—one deeply affecting the interests and feelings of slaveholders and non-slaveholders of the superior race, and of more than half a million already unarmitted inferiors pressed down by their weight.

The apparent evil which now produces so much anxiety and agitation here, I feel a firm conviction wise counsels will overrule for good. I believe that the removal from among us of such of the freed people of color as might be induced willingly to go to such parts of Central America as our Government could open up to them and establish as a secure home, would be fraught with benefits to us, to the emigrants, to the people receiving them, and to all concerned in the commerce of this continent within the tropics. I have already quoted the account of a late visitor and most acute observer, sent to report on the condition of that country. He confirms the general impression in regard to the effete state of the Spanish race in Honduras and the other Central American States; the insurrectionary disposition of the Indians and mestizos of mixed Indian and Spanish blood, which produces incessant civil war and revolution; and he shows that the African race constitutes the basis on which some enprgetic and intelligent Power must build a stable structure of free government. The negroes and mulattoes in Honduras number one hundred and forty thousand; the Indians one hundred thousand; the whites about fifty thousand; but of this caste he remarks, that—

"Indiscriminate amalgamation has nearly obliterated the former distinction of caste, and few families of pure Spanish descent are known. Some of the wealthiest merchants of the department of Tegucigalpa are blacks, possessing a surprising degree of business tact. Two of the largest commercial houses have negro proprietors, whose mercantile relations extend to Europe, whence they import most of their goods. Though the great majority of the negroes of Honduras are a thoroughly debased and ignorant class, there are numerous exceptions. The Senate and Assembly have contained many highly intelligent blacks and mulattoes, thoroughly educated in the Central American school of politics, and with sufficient discernment to foresee the decline of their own influence, and the power of the negro race, with the introduction of the Teutonic stock. Hence their violent opposition to foreign enterprises, in the national councils and in their private circles. The clergy are mostly negroes or mestizos. Their power for evil has been largely contracted since the independence; but, with a few exceptions, these men exercise rather a favorable influence over the people, and are generally respected."

Mr. Chairman, it is to this country, rich in mines, in every tropical production, and open to our emigrants and to our commerce through two great bays, one on the Pacific and the other on the Atlantic, and within three days' steaming of our own coast, that I would propose to form a settlement for such of our colored race now free, or that may hereafter be freed, as might volunteer to establish it under the auspices of our Government. And touching this most important policy, as calculated to deliver our Republic from the incubus which threatens so much mischief, and to convert it into a means of so much good, I beg leave to take a lesson from the colonial policy of Great Britain, which received as a system its finished and most liberal form under the late administration of Lord John Russell—Earl Grey presiding over the office of Secretary of State for the Colonial Department. The whole system is developed in a masterly series of letters addressed by the Earl to the Premier, which, with the history of the colonization that has girdled the world with Great Britain's dependencies, gives the reforms that make them adhere to the empire without force and from a sense of mutual advantage embraced in a common power and glory. The particular circumstance in that policy to which I would point the eye, is one which has uniformly characterized it: the transplantation of a better informed people, imbued with the traits they wished to impress on the race they sought to subject to their influence. The example I adduce, as applicable to the scheme I would recommend, is in Earl Grey's letter on Trinidad. Speaking of the various transplantations made for the improvement of Trinidad, he says:

"Steps have also been taken, within the last two years, for procuring immigrants of a far more valuable description than those from India. I refer to the free black and colored inhabitants of the United States. These people are regarded as an incumbrance, and their presence is considered a most serious evil in the States which they now inhabit, while there can be no doubt that many of them would be the best possible settlers who could be introduced into Trinidad. Speaking the English, with habits of industry and of civilized life, and well adapted by their constitution to the climate, there seems to be no reason to doubt the success of black and colored immigrants from the United States. Provided a proper selection is made of the individuals to be brought, their introduction could not fail to be of the highest value to the colony, not only from the actual accession of its population, which would be thus obtained, but from the example which they would afford to its present inhabitants. Such an addition to the existing population of Trinidad would have a tendency to raise the whole community in the scale of civilization; whereas, there is precisely the opposite tendency with respect to immigration from almost any other quarter, and this is no slight drawback to the advantage to be obtained from it;" (that is, from the immigration from India.)

Now this element of strength and improvement which English policy would allure to its West India possessions, I would allure to some congenial region on our own continent, with a view to their welfare, and to the extension of the influence and the commerce of their native country, the United States. I propose for imitation the example of the great pioneer nation in colonization. It has exhibited the elastic power of popular representative self-government, by which it has stretched Great Britain—though a mere selvege of the continent of Europe, saved from the grasp of its despots by a channel of the sea—around the world; erecting an empire greater than the Roman by the art of making and managing dependencies. Conquest over barbarous tribes by naval and military force, was the first step in this great career. But when these tribes became nations, instructed in the arts of civilization and skilled in the use of arms—a progress urged on as necessary to the commerce, aggrandizement, and defense of England—they would no longer be held subjected by force, and the whole system has been changed gradually into that which is in reality a confederacy, with Great Britain for its head, and her crown the symbol, drawing together the united powers of the whole. Earl Grey describes the principle of this great revolution as follows:

"Keeping steadily in view that the welfare and civilization of the inhabitants of the colonies and the advantage which the empire at large may derive from their prosperity, are the only objects for which the extension of these dependencies is desirable, and believing also that there can be no doubt as to the superiority of free governments, to those of an opposite character, as instruments of promoting the advancement of communities, in which they can be made to work with success, I consider it to be the obvious duty and interest of this country to extend representative institutions to every one of its dependencies, where they have not been established, and where this can be done with safety."

The late rebellion in Canada was the immediate cause of putting the colonies upon the footing of the mother country in the freedom of its institutions. The American Revolution had taught a lesson that was not lost. Lord Grey says:

"The system now established in Canada is that of parliamentary government; that is to say, government by means of parties. This form of government is now working well in that and the neighboring provinces, and is probably, on the whole, the best plan hitherto adopted of enabling a colony in an advanced stage of its social progress, to exercise the privilege of self-government. It may therefore be regarded as the form which representative institutions, when they acquire their full development, are likely to take in the British Colonies."

In pursuance of this plan, when Lord Elgin was sent to Canada to give it practical effect, his instructions bore on their face the unqualified declaration, that "it cannot be too distinctly acknowledged that it is neither possible nor desirable to carry on the government of any of the British provinces in North America in opposition to the opinion of the inhabitants." This was a declaration of independence by the Government in advance of that contemplated by the people, and the consequence was that the Reformers came into power in the Canadas, and instead of persisting in the idea of annexation to the United States, they have become our rivals in progress, and hold their association with the renown and power of England as conferring advantages over us, from whom they are content to ask only a fair field for competition on this continent in a reciprocity treaty.

This scheme of securing the allegiance of the nations Great Britain has in her train, by imparting to them the benefit of the free institutions she enjoys, has been carried out, in a greater or less degree, all over the world. In the West Indies, in defiance of the violent opposition of island aristocracies, (the lords of the soil,) the Government consulted the greatest good of the greatest number, and set free all the slaves; and, what was held to be equally disastrous, it struck off the fetters of monopoly, which, by means of differential duties, gave the home market to the sugar-planters without competition. This double act of emancipation, tripled by the repeal of the navigation act, raised the cry of the privileged owners everywhere, that ruin was inevitable. Lord Grey shows the result in figures from the custom-house; and it appears that, both in the West Indies and East Indies, comparing five years before with five years after the act of freedom, the increase of the sugar crops alone, in the last five years, under free labor and free competition, was 635,869 cwts. Mr. D'Israeli, who had been a Tory croaker against these reforms, afterwards, in a speech in Parliament, made the amende to Lord John Russell, who was their author. After comparing results in detail, he lumps the matter, and says:

"In other words, British production has increased by 1,250,000 cwts., and foreign production (that is, slave grown sugar) has decreased by about 600,000 cwts. I may be called a traitor, I may be called a renegade; but I want to know whether there is any gentleman in this House, wherever he may sit, who would recommend a differential duty to prop up a prostrate industry which is already commanding the metropolitan market."

The same system of assimilating the provincial institutions to the British has been pursued in the cannibal island of New Zealand, and brought to bear successfully on that warlike and powerful race, said to be superior to our Shawnees, in bravery and intelligence. They have been trained into stone masons, road builders, farmers, and traders, municipal officers, and legislators, by the elective and representative rights conceded to them under the instruction and assistance of the English authority.

In Australia, once the land of convicts, the experiment works well. There parliamentary tactics are plied, and we hear of debates ending in the expulsion of a ministry who fail to meet the public expectation. It is now a land of gold, of herds, of agriculture, of commerce, of busy cities filled with refinement. Earl Grey tells us that in 1850 a census was taken of one element of this prosperity: "Of persons who had originally been prisoners, who were actually in the enjoyment either of entire freedom or that degree of freedom conferred by conditional pardon—the result of the investigation was to show that of such persons in these colonies there could not have been less than forty-eight thousand; and out of this large number, those who were not, in some way or other, maintaining themselves honestly, either by their labor or the property they had acquired, were so few that they formed a mere fraction of the whole."

The Secretary goes on to account for this by ascribing it to the salutary effect of transplantation; to change of scene, of society and habits, removal from temptation, and being forced by necessity to labor where wages were tempting, in the field or in tending herds, and having the opportunity to form a new character among a new people. Another obvious cause of this reformation, well understood in this country, is found in the ease of acquiring homesteads in the crown lands of Australia. To promote this, regulations were adopted, as Earl Grey expresses it, "with a view of insuring the distribution of land to those by whom it was wanted;" "since," as he adds, "there is no such fatal obstacle to the progress of a colony as having a large proportion of its lands engrossed by persons who make little use of the estates they acquired." This was effected by selling to settlers at the minimum price, and then providing that "the money received for the land may be so laid out that the bona fide settler may receive, in the increased value for occupation of the land he buys, full compensation for the price he is required to pay for it;" and he adds that it is "an essential part of the policy which ought to be pursued with regard to the alienation of land, that the proceeds of the land sales should be always so applied as to give this advantage to the purchaser." This is almost a homestead bill; for it gives back the price of the land, received in one hand, by paying it for the improvement of it with the other hand.

I have drawn thus largely on Secretary Grey's explanation of the colonial policy of Lord John Russell's administration, to point the eye of our Government to the causes of that success which is now the wonder of the world. India alone gives trouble; and that, doubtless, is attributable to the fact, that it has always been in the hands of a monopolizing company, which has had the right, and exerted it, to exclude Englishmen and English institutions according to its pleasure, out of the provinces, which have been kept for the company's benefit, in the hands of pensioned Nabobs. Lord Palmerston has already given notice of a bill which probably will place India in the nation's keeping.

The position which things are taking on the shores of Central America indicates a rivalry between England and the United States, as to the Power which is to exert the command over that region; to people it, civilize it, give it peace; in a word, make it in some sort a dependency—the only mode of saving it from barbarism, and from becoming a nuisance. The British Government has sent its subjects—free colored persons, Jamaica negroes—into the logwood and mahogany cuttings in Honduras, and into the Bay Islands, where she claimed a protectorate. She has restored the latter to the Government on the main land, stipulating that all the rights that make freemen of the people of England or in the United States shall be held under a sacred guarantee. Mr. Buchanan says in his late message, that this security taken for the people of the Bay Islands, is the establishment of "a State, at all times subject to British influence and control." And how would he prevent it? By stripping off the civil rights the people enjoy, and subjecting them to a dictator? He especially objects to their having "legislative, executive, and judicial officers, elected by themselves; of being exempt from the taxing power in every form," against the consent of their representatives; "the performance of military service, except for their own exclusive defense;" but above all, he holds the provision "that slavery shall not at any time hereafter be permitted to exist therein," to be the most obnoxious.

Now I do not believe that the people of the United States will allow Mr. Buchanan to wage a war against Great Britain to establish slavery in the Bay Islands, any more than they will allow him to establish it in Kansas by force of arms. Nor will they countenance his hostility to freedom of religious belief in the Bay Islands; nor to the elective franchise; nor trial by jury; nor the right of habeas corpus; nor of voting the taxes to be imposed on them, and providing exclusively for their own military defense. It is a scandal to the age that an American President objects to the guarantee of the American bill of rights, to secure the freedom of any people.

Instead of opposing, I think we should follow the example of England, and carry to the main land of Central America such of our free colored population as may be willing to go, upon the invitation of the Liberal party in that country, and extend our guarantee of freedom over them and the whole section of country which our Government may acquire, by purchase, for their reception. There is a necessity that some great civilized power should step in, to restore order and industry, under the guarantee of free and stable institutions. England tenders the security of her crown, and the best usages that have ever grown up under a crown. We should offer the support of our Constitution, and the earnest of prosperous freedom which it has assured to our northern Republic. Which they would choose, the southern Republics have already evinced, in the forms they have adopted; and the encroachments of our transatlantic brethren would never have been attempted, but for the departures manifested in late movements from the principles of the founders of our Government. While Great Britain has been breaking down slavery and monopoly in the West Indies, the hand that has been felt from this quarter was that of the filibuster. Cuba was ready to fly to the embraces of the United States, when she was repelled by two successive lawless expeditions, unmistakably marked by the features of the buccaners who ravaged that island of old.

And what have been the concomitants of General Walker's invasion? A proclamation revoking the constitutional decree delivering the greatest mass of the people from slavery; and the principle thus manifested was fitly illustrated by military executions, butcheries in the streets of the cities, and, lastly, by the conflagration of one of the oldest. These atrocities had the effect of uniting the people of these distracted States, at last, in one common object—the expulsion of the oppressor. Happily for the fame of our country, the renewal of this horrible enterprise has been thoroughly rebuked by the patriotism, courage, and decision of Commodore Paulding. The name has acquired a new luster to emblazon that which it inherits from the Revolution. If the commodore's act had the sanction of the Administration in advance, or shall receive it now, some proof will be given that it is not altogether degenerate, and much will have been done to remove from us the aversion, the want of confidence in the justice of this Republic, and the fear that it countenances a design to fix a yoke on Central America, instead of rescuing it from usurpation—results to be hailed as tending to fit our Government for the relation it should hold towards the Republics of this continent.

If, on the other hand, the Administration takes part with Walker and the faction in this country that support him, it will show to all the world that the scheme for the propagation of slavery by the sword, of which it has given strong indications in Kansas, is extended to the whole regions of the South. Such a scheme can never succeed unless the principle avowed as the basis of it, by Walker, shall prevail. The triumph of "military rule" over civil institutions in the slave States, and their separation from the free States, North and West, must be won as the first step to conquest; and then, as the next step, the whole power of the free Republics on this side of the Atlantic, and the hostile feeling, if not the direct force of Europe, must be encountered. The connection of the Atchison-Kansas conspiracy with that of Walker's against Central America is visible in the instruments who put them in motion. The same men, North and South, encourage both. Funds were raised for them in the same quarters; and such men as Colonel Titus are seen to emerge at one time in Kansas, at another in Nicaragua. The masses of the people nor their elevated statesmen, neither of the North nor South, of the East or West, not even the great body of the slave-owners, have any heart in the propagation of slavery. Apart from the politicians who use the question for their own advancement, the design has no support but in the enemies of the Union, who hate free government from the bitterness of their hearts, or from a vanity they would dignify as aristocratic pride.

In my opinion, the propagation of slavery can only be successfully resisted by the propagation of freedom. It is this mission, arrogated by Great Britain as peculiarly hers, which has conferred on her the preponderance she holds in almost every portion of the earth. She has swayed it with an iron hand, but every where of late years Anglo-Saxon justice, civilization, and Christianity, wherever they prevailed, have allowed every man to feel the comfort of laboring for himself, and he has labored all the better for his country.

Great Britain has her hands full in christianizing, civilizing, and improving, for commercial usefulness, the old continents. She must leave to us the regeneration of the new one; and this I find, from a paper in a late Westminster Review, marked by the editor with an unusual notification ascribing it to "an able and distinguished contributor," seems to be the opinion of some of the great men of England. This eloquent writer, describing the missions of what he calls "the four Empires," RUSSIA, FRANCE, GREAT BRITAIN, and the UNITED STATES, assigns its office to the latter in the following passage:

"And it may once for all be assumed that the human race, whatever Cabinets or Parliaments may think of it, will not be driven from their inevitable course. The work which has begun so largely will go forward. The Asiatic independence which survives will narrow down and grow feeble, and at last die. The will and the intellect of the more advanced races will rule in due time over that whole continent. The genius of France will follow the shores of the Mediterranean; the line of kingdoms which divides the empires of England and Russia will grow thinner, till their frontiers touch. In spite of Clayton-Bulwer treaties, and Dallas Clarendon interpretations of them, the United States will stretch their shadow ever further south. Revolution will cease to tear the empire of Montezuma. The falling Republics of Central America will not forever be a temptation, by their weakness, to the attacks of lawless ruffians. The valley of the mighty Amazon, which would grow corn enough to feed a thousand million mouths, must fall at last to those who will force it to yield its treasures. The ships which carry the commerce of America into the Pacific, carry, too, American justice and American cannon as the preachers of it. The Emperor of Japan supposed, that by Divine right, doing as he would with his own, he might close his country against his kind; that when vessels in distress were driven into his port, he might seize their crews as slaves, or kill them as unlicensed trespassers. An armed squadron, with the star-spangled banner flying, found its way into the Japan waters, and his serene Majesty was instructed that in nature's statute-book there is no right conferred on any man to act unrighteously, because it is his pleasure; that, in their own time, and by their own means, the upper powers will compel him, whether he pleases or not, to bring his customs into conformity with wiser usage."

The starting-point in this new career is the resumption of the progress which received its impulse in the revolution tending to the deliverance of the white laboring class of this country from the superincumbent weight of African slavery. This redemption of our own race from its vassalage under slavery has been brought to a standstill, and six millions of our free white kindred endure deprivation, corporeal and intellectual, from the slave occupation of the soil and of the pursuits which would add to their means of living and their sources of mental improvement. Neither the slave owners, nor the slave States, are responsible for the arrest of the enfranchisement which promised blessings to the toilers of both races. For, whether as a slave or free man, the presence of multitudes of the black race is found to be fatal to the interests of our race; their antagonism is as strong as that of oil and water, and so long as no convenient outlet, through which the unumitted slave can reach a congenial climate and country willing to receive him, is afforded, the institution of slavery stands on compulsion. But let me suppose Central America—tempting in gold and every production of the tropical soil to stimulate exertion, with a climate innoxious only to the black man—were opened up to him, under circumstances to advance him in the scale of humanity, how long before masters in all the temperate slave States would make compositions to liberate them on terms that would indemnify them for transplantation? Hundreds of more benevolent owners would, from a sense of public good and for conscience sake, by wills, or by deeds of emancipation, make this deliverance, if the General Government would take the charge of the deportation to the region it might acquire for them—a gradual and voluntary emancipation by individuals, if not by States, would thus in time be accomplished. I hold that it is the duty of the nation to offer this boon to slaveholders and to the slave States to enable them to have complete control of the subject, which is the source of so much anxiety and mischief to them.

What a change would soon be wrought in the condition of Maryland and Virginia, Tennessee and Kentucky, and in my own State, Missouri, if a smooth way were opened into the heart of the tropics—prodigal of wealth in the soil, in the mines, and in the forests; where the labor of the robust and skillful freedman, assisted by the capital and instruction, and inspired by the energy of enterprising American merchants, miners, or planters, would start everything into life. The mixed condition of the four different classes which, in our grain-growing States, obstruct each other; the masters dependent on the slaves, the slaves on their masters; the free negroes hanging on the skirts of both; while the great mass, the free white laborers, are cast out, in a great measure, from employment and all ownership in the soil, would be succeeded by the most useful of all the tillers of the earth, small frecholders and an independent tenantry. The influx of immigrants from Europe and the North, with moderate capital already running into Maryland and Virginia, would, as these States sloughed the black skin, fill up the rich region around the Chesapeake bay, the noblest bay in the world, fed by the most beautiful rivers, and brooded over by the most genial climate, and make it fulfill the prediction of Washington, who said, slavery abolished, it would become "the garden of America." The wilderness shores of the great inland sea, now almost as silent as in the days of Powhatan, would be alive with population; and the waters, now covered with swans, wild geese, and wild ducks, would be covered with sails and kept in commotion by the rush of steamers over them. The great rivers that run to waste over many latitudes of the healthful temperate zone would thunder with machinery, and the little Merrimac in Massachusetts, which, though frozen half the year, produces ninety millions of manufactures, would find more than a hundred rivals in giant streams which are precipitated in the Chesapeake. The mountains would give to the hand of free labor boundless wealth in coal, salt, and ores, and their surface in pasturing innumerable herds and flocks. The plains and valleys would teem with grain, the lowlands with meadow, and the Old Dominion, instead of being "the lone mother of dead empires," would resume her hereditary crown and nascent strength, imparting new growth to all her offspring States. The noble ambition which once led the way to preëminence in this great Confederacy must again be attained by a love of liberty, by love of justice, by a magnanimous patriotism, prompt to make any sacrifice of temporary convenience for the great moral and political principles, the foundation of free institutions. The attempt to enforce slavery in Kansas and Central America by the sword, and thus make the whole intermediate space on the continent fall under its ascendancy, will fail. There is no Mohammed to establish such a dominion, nor is this age—the age of Christian strength and popular power—one to succumb to slavery propagandist prophets. Indeed, the Moslems all over the world have fallen so low, under the influence of this part of their creed, that they are obliged to surrender, and take the law from the accursed nations they stigmatize as Franks. The civilized world is at war with the propagation of slavery, whether by fraud or by the sword; and those who look to gain political ascendancy on this continent by bringing the weight of this system, like an enormous yoke, not to subject the slaves only, but also their fellow-citizens and kindred of the same blood, have made false auguries of the signs of the times.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. BOGOCCK temporarily in the chair.) The time fixed by the House for close of general debate having arrived, no further debate is in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask permission of the Committee to have printed the remainder of my remarks.

The permission was granted.

The resolution offered by Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, as modified by him, was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to a uniform bankrupt law; and that so much of the President's annual message as relates to the duties of an independent State in its relations with the members of the great family of nations, to restrain its people from acts of hostile aggression against their citizens or subjects; and so much as relates to the present neutrality law of the 20th of April, 1818; to the fitting out within the limits of our country of lawless expeditions against some of the Central American States; to the instructions issued to the marshals and district attorneys, and to the appropriate Army and Navy officers, together with the President's recommendation that we should adopt such measures as will be effective in restraining our citizens from committing such outrages, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who are hereby required to inquire into and report upon the expediency of the repeal or modification of said act of 20th of April, 1818, with power to report by bill or otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. That is the original resolution as modified. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] moved to amend the resolution by inserting after the words "bankrupt law," the words "be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary," and by striking out all after the word "outrages," and inserting in lieu thereof, "be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs." The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER] offered the following as an amendment to the amendment:

And also, that said committee report, so far as they may be able, the present social and political condition of the people of Nicaragua, and whether they invite colonies from the United States to settle among them; also, whether the soil, climate, and other natural advantages of that country are such as to encourage emigration thither from the northern States of this Confederacy.

Mr. THAYER. I ask leave to modify my amendment by striking out the word "northern."

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. As no vote has been taken on the amendment, the gentleman has the right to modify it.

The amendment was so modified.

The question was then taken on Mr. THAYER's amendment as modified; and, on a division, there were—ayes 72, noes 77.

Mr. GROW called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GROW and KEITT were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 97.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STANTON. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

And that said committee also report to the House a joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore Hiram Paulding for his patriotic and spirited conduct in the capture of William Walker and his followers, on the coast of Nicaragua, and their return to the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I do not offer that amendment as the foundation for a speech.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. That amendment is not germane to the resolutions before the committee.

Mr. STANTON. Certainly it is.

Mr. READY. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will withdraw his question of order. I want a vote upon the amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. No, sir, I do not withdraw the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair must say that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia is well taken. There is nothing in the President's annual message that relates to Commodore Paulding or to General Walker.

Mr. STANTON. I think the Chair is mistaken; and if the Chair will allow me to say a word on the point of order, I will show that the amendment is in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I call the gentleman to order. If he is not satisfied with the ruling of the Chair, let him take an appeal.

Mr. STANTON. Then I will take an appeal if the gentleman desires it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that the appeal is not debatable.

He will, however, hear any suggestion the gentleman may have to make if no objection be made.

Mr. STANTON. I only propose to state my point of order. This committee is now maturing matters for the consideration of the standing committees of the House. It is proposing subjects for reference growing out of the President's annual message. Now I submit to the Chair and to the committee, that the Central American question and the capture of Walker are so connected with that message as to make it a proper and legitimate subject of reference to one of the standing committees of the House. I regard it certainly as germane to the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] which has been decided to be in order.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Ohio, that this committee has no right to carve out business for the standing committees of the House. It can act upon no other subjects except such as have been referred to it by the House; that is, in this case, such as are embraced in the annual message of the President of the United States. The Chair recollects nothing in the President's message about the capture of Walker and his men, or the conduct of Commodore Paulding, and therefore he holds that the amendment is out of order. The question is upon the appeal of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. I insist upon my appeal; and in this connection I desire to call the attention of the Chair and of the committee to the fact that the President in his annual message refers especially to our relations with Central America, and to this expedition of Walker.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That was the special message.

Mr. STANTON. No, sir; the annual message. It refers directly to this expedition, and I submit that there is so much connection between the message and the capture of Walker as to make my amendment properly and legitimately in order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I should like to have that portion of the annual message read.

Mr. WINSLOW. This question of order is not debatable, and I object to any further discussion.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair spoke of the message only from recollection. He does not remember any reference directly to Walker or Paulding.

Mr. LETCHER. Walker had not been captured then.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I hope that portion of the message will be read.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Unless it is strictly in order, I object to any reading.

Mr. STANTON. I will read it myself. It only occupies two or three lines, and is as follows:

"Notwithstanding these precautions, the expedition has escaped from our shores. Such enterprises can do no possible good to the country, but have already inflicted much injury both on its interests and its character. They have prevented peaceful emigration from the United States to the States of Central America, which could not fail to prove highly beneficial to all the parties concerned. In a pecuniary point of view alone, our citizens have sustained heavy losses from the seizure and closing of the transit route by the San Juan between the two oceans."

"The leader of the recent expedition was arrested at New Orleans, but was discharged on giving bail for his appearance in the insufficient sum of $2,000."

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to all further debate upon this question of order.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to move that the committee rise for the purpose of reconsidering the resolution closing debate upon the message. Gentlemen have not talked enough upon it. I want to make a speech myself. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 33, noes 108.

Mr. CLEMENS. I move that the appeal from the decision of the Chair be laid upon the table.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. It is not in order to move to lay upon the table in committee.

Mr. PHELPS demanded tellers on the appeal. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and BILLINGHURST were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes one hundred and eleven; noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. MAYNARD, to insert, after the words "bankrupt law," the words "be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary," and to strike out all after the word "outrages," and insert in lieu thereof, the words "be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs;" so that the resolution would read:

Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to a uniform bankrupt law, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and that so much of the President's annual message as relates to the duties of an independent State in its relations with the members of the great family of nations, to restrain its people from acts of hostile aggression against their citizens or subjects; and so much as relates to the present neutrality law of the 20th of April, 1818; to the fitting out within the limits of our country of lawless expeditions against some of the Central American States; to the instructions issued to the marshals and district attorneys, and to the appropriate Army and Navy officers, together with the President's recommendation that we should adopt such measures as will be effective in restraining our citizens from committing such outrages, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LEITER. I move to amend the amendment, by adding the following:

And that said committee report whether said General William Walker was induced to enter upon his filibustering expedition by the "Ostend manifesto" and the letters of the Secretary of State to the filibuster meetings in New York city and elsewhere.

[Much laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. I raise the point that the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. LEITER. I presume I must submit, as there is a large majority against me, although I believe the amendment is germane.

Mr. LETCHER. It is well to submit when a large majority is against the gentleman.

Mr. MAYNARD's amendment was disagreed to. The question recurred on the original resolution as modified.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to strike out these words:

"And also are hereby required to inquire into and report upon the expediency of a repeal or modification of said act of 20th April, 1818, with power to report by bill or otherwise."

Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment in good faith. I shall not undertake, in the few minutes allotted to me under the rules of the House, to argue the main question. If I rightly understand these resolutions, they propose the usual course of reference of such subjects as are embraced in the President's message. Under the rules of the House, I believe that a committee cannot originate business of itself, and it is, therefore, the custom to instruct them by referring to the appropriate committees the subjects embraced in the President's message. While I do not object to the inquiry contained in the words I propose to strike out, I do object to its incumbering the usual reference. I object to it at this time, particularly, because it may be construed into an expression by this House of some dissatisfaction with that with which a large majority of the House is satisfied. If the matter is referred in the usual way, if the subjects mentioned in that resolution are referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, without instructions, that committee will report according to the line of their prescribed duty.

But if, under these circumstances, in the face of what has just occurred, and more particularly in the face of what has been said here, many gentlemen in this committee having justified the conduct of one who, at any rate, was a fugitive from the justice of his country, if we at this time add to the resolution the instructions that the committee shall inquire into the expediency of repealing the act of 1818, we give to this country the voice of this House, that those circumstances have been such as to make that act of doubtful propriety.

Mr. Chairman, I will not discuss that act here; but I may say that I think that many gentlemen have erred in the views they have taken of it. The act, in itself, enforces no new doctrine. The act is, so to speak, a neutrality act; the act is an act to punish offenses which were recognized as offenses before that act was passed, but which, as the courts of the United States have not common-law jurisdiction, could not be punished without the intervention of that statute. Those offenses were actually prohibited by the law of nations; for that which could not be done is prohibited, and that act was passed mainly for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction. That jurisdiction the courts of the United States could not, before its passage, exercise. I construe that act, so far from declaring any new law, so far from establishing any new laws of neutrality, simply as recognizing existing laws, and as declaring that any infractions of them shall be punished.

And I may say here to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] who originated this matter, that the success of his motion, either to repeal the act or to modify and change it—because to modify and change is, after all, but another word for "repeal"—he will present to the civilized world the spectacle of our country recognizing as a wrong the fitting out of an expedition within its borders against a foreign territory, and at the same time declaring that it is unwilling to punish the perpetrators of that wrong.

It is for these reasons that I am desirous that that portion of the message shall be referred in the usual way.

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Chairman, the position of the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. PHILLIPS] is founded upon the assumption that the reference of a matter to a committee is an approval of it by the House. The assumption is utterly unfounded; for every day matters are thus referred, without the slightest approval or committal on the part of the House.

In my judgment, sir, the whole body of the neutrality laws should be referred to a committee for examination, for great doubt exists in the mind of the country as to their scope and construction. Men of high legal attainments in this House differ in their construction of the provisions of the neutrality laws, and the extent to which they clothe the President with power to use the land and naval forces of the Union in the pursuit and capture of expeditions from our shores, which expeditions are fitted out in violation of our laws. The penalties and prohibitions contained in the neutrality laws are severe and numerous, and there should be as little doubt as the terms of the language will allow, in the provision of all penal statutes. In the House and in the Senate, men of high legal attainments and extensive judicial practice differ upon vital points in these laws; and it is due to ourselves and to the country that this difference should be removed, and all doubts be cleared up.

We all agree as to the good faith and loyalty involved in the discharge of our international obligations; but it is not clear how far Congress has clothed the Executive with authority in pursuance of international or statutory law. The President himself has asked for new powers, and has pronounced the act of Commodore Paulding, in the arrest of Walker, a "grave error." Justice to ourselves, justice to the country, justice to the constituted authorities, require that the whole corpus of the neutrality laws should be submitted to a thorough investigation, and should receive such modification or amendment as may be necessary to a clear comprehension of their provisions. In this way we will relieve our citizens from the difficulties of disputed construction, and save our Government from the invasions against each other of the several coordinate departments into which it has been partitioned.

I wish the power of the Executive to use the Army and Navy to be defined. I do not wish to stretch his authority either through cloudy provisions of statutory enactment, or the elastic, I may say indefinite, expansibility of international law. Sir, it is dangerous to regard the executive department of the Government as invested with inherent power to execute international obligations or carry out the principles of public law. Sir, the whole code of international law is founded upon dynastic interests, and is but the public régime of monarchies. How many provisions have we established in it, and by which of its provisions are the rights of a Republic sheltered and protected? Sir, this code is elastic for monarchies, but cramped for republics. As it is not the offspring of such institutions as ours, we should be careful not to extend Executive authority through blind conformity to its indefinite stipulations.

The amendment of Mr. PHILLIPS was then agreed to—ayes 92, noes 67.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I offer the following amendment:

Add at the close of the resolution the following words: "And who are hereby instructed to report on the expediency of making the neutrality laws more rigorous."

It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, and if it was, I could not carry it out to the necessary extent, to enter into an argument on this question. There is no argument to be submitted. The position of this country is as plain and visible as is the atmosphere about us when the sun rises. The duties that devolve on us are acknowledged. It requires, sir, no argument to explain our national position. It is a position which is regulated and governed by international laws. It is a position which has never been disturbed by argument or judicial decision; and no argument that has been submitted in the course of this debate has in the slightest degree disturbed the national position of this country toward its sister nations, or the obligations of the citizens of this country toward their own Government. The neutrality laws are but an announcement on the part of the sovereignty of this country as to what are the duties and the obligations devolving upon our citizens in regard to the position which this country holds towards the nations at large.

If these laws have been violated, and if there is no power in our Government to punish the offenders, it follows distinctly that the laws are feeble; that they are weak; and that strength and vigor should be applied to them, instead of a modification that might render them more feeble and more weak. It is not for us, as representatives of the people of this country, to stand here haggling about principles and positions which control or modify our position in the family of nations. Let us maintain the ground on which we are placed by international law. Let us fulfill our obligations; and if there is no power in the executive arm to enforce the obligations of our citizens, why let us perform our duty and strengthen that arm. Therefore it is that I offer my amendment with the view of strengthening the Executive arm and making the laws more rigorous.

Mr. QUITMAN. Mr. Chairman, this remarkable fact must strike the mind of the members of this committee, that gentlemen who profess to understand so well the neutrality laws, as they are called, (although the act is an act for the punishment of crimes against the United States,) are still unwilling to give the subject a thorough investigation, section by section, and clause by clause. They speak of laws to carry out the neutral relations of this country. The honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] and myself entirely concur in the duty and the necessity of carrying out the neutrality obligations of this country. But what are they? Let me say that learned gentlemen and great statesmen have thought differently from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE.] Let us hear what was said by the great statesman of Kentucky, who descended from the chair and took part in the argument, when the act of 1818 was passed. He was a man not in the habit of uttering sentiments which he did not believe. He had watched the whole course of legislation on the subject of American rights; and what did he say? I read from the history of Congress, published by Gales & Seaton:

"Mr. Clay offered some general remarks on the offensive nature of this bill."

This very act of April 20, 1818.

—(which, he said, instead of an act to enforce neutrality, ought to be entitled an act for the benefit of his Majesty the King of Spain.)"

That was the language of Mr. Clay; and the gentleman from New York, who offers this amendment, to render the neutrality laws more stringent, will see how far he differs from Mr. Clay, who called the act of 1818 an offensive act.

In the same debate, of the 18th of March, Mr. Clay is reported to have said:

"In the threshold of this discussion, he confessed he did not like much the origin of that act. There had been some disclosures—not in an official form, but in such shape as to entitle them to credence—that showed that act to have been the result of a leaking on the part of foreign agents in this country, which he regretted to have seen. But from whatever source it sprung, if it was an act necessary to preserve the neutral relations of the country, it ought to be retained; but this he denied."

"In its provisions it went beyond the obligations of the United States to other powers, and that part of it was unprecedented in any nation which compelled citizens of the United States to give bonds not to commit acts without the jurisdiction of the United States, which it is the business of foreign nations, and not of this Government, to guard against."

Again, on the same day, this bill being still under consideration, Mr. Clay, alluding to the Spanish Minister, said:

"He (Mr. Clay) would not treat with disrespect even the minister of Ferdinand, whose cause this bill was intended to benefit; he is a faithful minister; if, not satisfied with making representations to the Foreign Department, he also attends the proceedings of the Supreme Court, to watch its decisions; he affords but so many proofs of the fidelity for which the representatives of Spain have always been distinguished. And how mortifying is it, sir, to hear of the honorary rewards and titles, and so forth, granted for these services; for, if I am not mistaken, our act of 1817 produced the bestowal of some honor on this faithful representative of his Majesty; and, if this bill passes, which is now before us, I have no doubt he will receive some new honor for his further success."

Now, sir, that act was not induced by a sense of our duty to other countries, but it was the result of the teasing cry, sir, of an influence which surrounds almost every Administration—the influence of stars and garters and crowned heads—an influence which is inconsistent with the true interests of this country; an influence which is hostile to true Americanism, and hostile to the spirit of American liberty. These were the influences which Mr. Clay says brought about the passage of the act of 1818.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If the gentleman will allow me, I will read the closing paragraph of Mr. Clay's speech on the occasion to which he refers. He says:

"Let us put all these statutes out of our way, except that of 1794. When was that passed? At a moment when the enthusiasm of liberty ran through the country with electric rapidity; when the whole country en masse was ready to lend a hand and aid the French nation in their struggle. General Washington, revered name, the Father of his country, could hardly arrest this inclination. Yet, under such circumstances, the act of 1794 was found abundantly sufficient. There was, then, no gratuitous assumption of neutral debts. For twenty years that act has been found sufficient. But some keen-sighted, sagacious foreign minister finds out that it is not sufficient, and the act of 1817 is passed. That act we find condemned by the universal sentiment of the country; and I hope it will receive further condemnation by the vote of the House this day."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PALMER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "more rigorous." I maintain that the neutrality laws of the country are now sufficiently stringent, if they are properly and in good faith enforced. I thank the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KERR] for calling the attention of the House to the fact that the President of the United States disagrees with a majority of this Congress in regard to this movement of General Walker in Nicaragua, and in regard to his arrest by Commodore Paulding. The President says, in the message sent in to the Senate a few days ago, that Commodore Paulding has "committed a grave error" in arresting General Walker upon the shores of Nicaragua. He says that he violated the law in that arrest.

Sir, I congratulate the country that in the only two cases in which the President stands pledged before the nation to aid and abet slavery propaganda, which has controlled the country for the last twenty years, he has received the emphatic condemnation of the country and of this House. He has undertaken to enforce upon the people of Kansas a slavery constitution contrary to their will, and in that he has received the emphatic condemnation of Congress. He has undertaken, by trickery, by collusion, by complicity with the filibuster movement of Walker in Central America, to aid and abet that movement, and in that he has received the most emphatic condemnation of the country. He says, contrary to the sentiment of this country, and contrary to the sentiment of a majority of both Houses of Congress, that Commodore Paulding committed a grave error, and was guilty of a violation of law in the arrest of Walker and his men. In that, too, he has not been supported by the country; and he is not supported by the prominent men of his own party in this House.

The arguments which have been adduced in this House by prominent men belonging to the party of the President, upon the legal question of the right and propriety of the action of Commodore Paulding, are, to my mind, conclusive and unanswerable, especially the legal argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GROESBECK,] and also that of my colleague from New York, [Mr. SICKLES.] It seems to be conceded on all sides here that Commodore Paulding has done no more than his duty; that he has not been guilty of a violation of the laws of his country, and much less the law of nations, when he has arrested this man, who is charged by the President with committing robbery and murder, and every outrage, and brought him here to be tried by the courts of the country. And it is conceded that he has done it in the only practicable way that it could be done. He, and his brother officers in the fleet under his command, when they applied to the Secretary of the Navy for more specific instructions, to ascertain what was the intention of the Government in respect to the arrest of Walker and his men, received vague and unsatisfactory instructions in reply. He was left, therefore, to execute the law in accordance with his own understanding of its provisions; and, like a brave and noble man, ready to take the responsibility, and to use the force under his command to accomplish the purpose for which he was sent, Commodore Paulding went there, and, in the only practicable way in which he could obey his instructions, and stop the expedition, he arrested these men, and brought them home, to be tried by the laws of his country.

The only error Commodore Paulding committed was, that he did not bring home the deluded followers of Walker, and leave their buccaneer leader to the retributive justice of the authority of the country whose soil he had violated, whose property he had robbed, and whose people he had murdered.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. The object I had in view seems to have been somewhat misunderstood by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] and the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KERR.] If the amended proposition was intended merely as an inquiry into the necessity of providing additional punishments for a violation of the neutrality laws, I could not for a moment object. I should object to the appointment of a select committee, but I would vote for the reference of the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary. The experience of the gentleman from Mississippi must have taught him, last year, the danger of referring to a select committee matters which properly belong to one of the standing committees of the House. If I recollect rightly, it was the objection of the gentleman from Mississippi which led the House to discover that a law, which had been reported by a select committee, was so defective, and so radically wrong, that it was almost instantly reconsidered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say that, to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary at all, in advance, is to declare the necessity for such instructions. The President, in his annual message to Congress, took occasion to say:

"I commend the whole subject to the attention of Congress, believing that our duty and our interest, as well as our national character, require that we should adopt such measures as will be effectual in restraining our citizens from committing such outrages."

It is that portion of the message which brings the whole subject before the Committee on the Judiciary for inquiry. Now, has not the President of the United States commended to the action of Congress the whole subject. It is because I believe that he has done so; because I believe the neutrality laws, which have been the work of many years, and are recognized as identical in all civilized nations, require no tinkering, and will only suffer by any attempt at their alteration, that I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. QUITMAN. I understand the gentleman to put a question to me. Will he permit me to answer it?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Certainly.

Mr. QUITMAN. The gentleman asks me whether my action in moving that this subject should be referred to a special committee did not arise from a wish to make the neutrality laws—

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. I insist that the debate shall be confined to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules the debate must be confined to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have confined myself to the amendment.

Mr. QUITMAN. I do not see that the gentleman from Georgia had a right to interrupt me. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to ask me whether I do not desire to throw obstructions in the way of the punishment of offenses against the neutrality laws. I desire no such thing. I am as willing as he or any other member of this House, to carry out the law of nations; but I stand here to vindicate my belief that a portion of the act of 1818 goes beyond the duties and obligations which we owe to other nations, and that by it, in the language of Mr. Clay, we have assumed a voluntary duty which it is time we should shake off. I wish to correct it upon great national principles.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PALMER withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the word "rigorous," and to insert instead of the word "making" the word "amending," so that the amendment will read, if amended, "and who are hereby instructed to report on the expediency of amending the neutrality laws."

Mr. Chairman, my object is not to engage in the discussion in regard to the reading of the neutrality law, nor to express any opinion in regard to the operation of the neutrality laws at this time; but to send this subject from the Committee of the Whole to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the desire expressed, on the part of this committee, that they shall give us their opinion on the propriety of amending these laws at all. The diversity of opinion that has been expressed here as to the true construction of these laws, as to the force and effect of these laws, affords the most conclusive evidence to my mind that this subject ought to undergo a scrutinizing investigation by the law committee of this House; and that that committee, in response to the general inquiry which agitates the country, should, by their report, put these laws, and the reasons for them, upon a foundation which will vindicate their propriety as they exist at present, or indicate to us what would be the line of sensible legislation if we undertake to amend them. This is all I have to say.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I accept the gentleman's amendment as a modification to my amendment.

Mr. MILLSON. I presume it is in order to oppose the amendment as modified?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know whether it is exactly in order; but the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to oppose the amendment. I object to the amendment in the form in which it now stands after the gentleman from New York has accepted the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, for to adopt it in that form will be substantially to reinsert the very words which the committee has deliberately stricken out. Now, sir, why did the committee strike out, on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] the words requiring the committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the neutrality laws? I presume it was because the committee supposed that the giving of this instruction at this period of the history of the country would indicate what I am very sure does not exist, and that is, a desire on the part of this House to repeal these laws so as to give additional facility to these marauding and unlawful expeditions. I think it better, perhaps, that the committee should consider the question without any instructions from the House. The President has asked that additional penalties may be provided, or that additional powers may be granted to the Executive. The committee may very well inquire into the expediency of providing additional penalties, and granting additional powers on the simple reference of the President's message without any instruction; but to adopt the proposition as it now stands would seem to imply what I am very sure the gentleman from New York does not suppose that the House are seriously contemplating, the propriety of removing by amendment some of the penalties inflicted upon the authors of these unlawful expeditions.

Sir, I should not suppose that these neutrality laws were very rigorous; for very few, if any, convictions have taken place under them; and while I objected to the original proposition of the gentleman from New York, when he proposed to direct the committee to inquire whether these laws should be made more rigorous, I still more object to the proposition as it now stands, because it will imply that we have heretofore been executing these neutrality laws when we have executed them, not because it was our duty as a nation to do so, but only because there was a necessity laid upon us which we would willingly avoid or throw off. Sir, I take it for granted that the United States desire to execute these laws not because they are laws, but because it is right and proper that such laws should be executed.

Mr. COLFAX. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is not this an amendment to an amendment, which is itself an amendment to an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky was accepted by the gentleman from New York as a modification of his amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I submit whether the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] is in order, it having been voted down once before. I did not raise the question before, not caring to prevent the gentleman from New York from making his speech. But, inasmuch as there is another proposition to amend, I raise the question of order now.

Mr. COLFAX. I think the question of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The rule of the House is, that when words have been inserted, it is not in order afterwards to move to strike them out; but the Chair is not aware of any rule which would prevent the committee from striking out words and afterwards inserting them. If there be a rule to sustain the gentleman's point of order the Chair would be obliged if he would refer to it.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I wish to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely mistaken. The former amendment, which was voted down, required the committee to report upon the propriety of repealing the neutrality laws. This does not do any such thing.

The amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. COLFAX, was read, as follows:

Strike out the language as modified, and insert after the word "expediency" the words, of "making the neutrality laws more rigorous and effective."

Mr. COLFAX. Mr. Chairman, I concur with the language which fell from the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] when he offered his amendment; and I liked that amendment, because it was clear and decisive. It meant something. It would have called forth an expression of the opinion of the committee upon the question which is now agitating this entire country. But I regret that the gentleman should have afterward modified his amendment so that it would call for no expression of opinion whatever; and I now offer my amendment to the amendment for the purpose of having a test vote in the committee upon the question whether they believe the neutrality laws ought to be made more rigorous and efficient, or not. We owe it to ourselves, and to our country's reputation, that we shall see that these laws shall not be full of loop-holes and escapes whereby expeditions can go from our shores under the disguise of agricultural expeditions and bands of emigrants, and that we shall never allow this country to be made a place where expeditions of a piratical character may be fitted out and precipitated upon other and weaker nations in our vicinity. I, therefore, desire to ascertain the sense of this committee, that a clear expression of their opinion may be sent to the country upon this important question. I desire a test vote upon this question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to inquire of the Chair, what will be the effect of the vote on this amendment? If the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is voted down, then there can be no vote upon it in the House, as I understand the rules. If, on the other hand, the committee shall vote in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, then we can have a separate vote upon that amendment in the House, and Representatives can be placed upon the record upon this great question. That is what I desire.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Maine, and TAYLOR, of New York, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 89.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question now being on Mr. JOHN COCHRANE's amendment as modified—

Mr. DEAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN and MILLSON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 37.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred on the resolution as amended; and it was agreed to.

The other resolutions offered by Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, were severally reported as follows—no amendment being offered to any of them save to the last:

4. Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Army of the United States, the raising of four additional regiments and to the construction of a military road through the Territories of the United States, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

5. Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Navy of the United States, and to the construction of ten small war steamers, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

6. Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Post Office Department, its operations and conditions, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

7. Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the public lands, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

8. Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the commerce of the United States, and to the fitness of the river La Plata and its tributaries for navigation by steam, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

9. Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to our intercourse with, and relations to, the various Indian tribes, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

10. Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Territories of Kansas, Utah, and Arizona, be referred to the Committee on Territories.

11. Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the District of Columbia, be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

12. Resolved, That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the subject of a Pacific railroad, be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. PHELPS. I offer the following amendment to the last resolution:

Strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert the following:

That so much of the President's message as relates to a railroad to the Pacific ocean, be referred to a select committee to be composed of thirteen members, to be appointed by the Speaker.

Some days since I obtained the floor, and endeavored to introduce a resolution providing for the raising of a select committee to be charged with the subject-matter now under consideration—the construction of a railroad from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean. I was unsuccessful at that time in having the resolution introduced. I have now thought proper to propose it as an amendment to the resolution submitted by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES.] If this amendment be adopted, it will withdraw the consideration of the subject of the Pacific railroad from the Committee on Roads and Canals. I am aware that my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] the chairman of that committee, is opposed to the construction of any railroad to the Pacific ocean. He will undisguisedly tell you that he is unwilling that the Government should aid in this great enterprise in any manner whatever. He will tell you that if such a railroad is to be constructed, its construction ought to be left to individuals and corporations, without the fostering hand of the Government of the United States.

The subject is one of vast importance. It is of vast importance to all the people of this country, and particularly is it of great importance to all the people of the valley of the Mississippi. If this committee be raised it will take into consideration the question of how many roads shall be built, the line to be taken by them, and the different routes proposed by the advocates of this great measure. Moreover, it will be charged with the consideration of the manner in which this great enterprise should be accomplished.

I do not expect, at this time, to say anything on this subject; but I only ask whether it is not proper that this matter should be referred to a select committee, to consist of a greater number than the standing committees of the House. I propose the number thirteen; but I am not particular about that. Each of the standing committees of the House to which it might be proper to refer this subject-matter, is already burdened with the ordinary business which is and will be referred to them. I desire to see a committee organized that will command the respect and confidence of the country; and when the Speaker of the House shall be called upon to form a committee on this subject-matter, he will have it in his power to consider the propriety of appointment to that committee. As a matter of course, if a select committee be ordered, it will be one favorable to the subject; but on that committee the opponents of the measure are entitled to be represented; and I have no doubt that if my amendment be adopted, a committee fairly reflecting the interests represented on this floor—the interests of those in favor of different routes, and of those opposed to the measure—will be appointed. I only ask the House not to send this subject-matter to a committee, the chairman of which I know is opposed to this measure.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think, sir, the gentleman from Missouri is too late with his resolution. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] who introduced these resolutions for referring the message, disposed of this subject in one of the resolutions, passed over by this committee to be reported to the House. The fourth resolution is:

"That so much of the said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Army of the United States, the raising of four additional regiments, and the construction of a military road through the territories of the United States, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs."

Quoting, I believe, the very language used by the President in his message upon this subject. He places the power to construct this road upon the ground that it is one of the military defenses of the country, and in the exact language by which he characterizes it, you have disposed of the subject, and therefore this resolution is, in my opinion, out of order at this time.

But, sir, the gentleman from Missouri said that I was opposed to this project, and I take occasion here to say that I do disagree with the President utterly and entirely upon this subject. I believe that there is no such power as he claims delegated to Congress, either under the war-making power or any other power, to make roads or canals by this Government. The President tells us that former experience has taught him that a strict construction of the Constitution is the only true or safe course for this Government to pursue; but then he comes in with what, in my humble judgment, is one of the most far-fetched and erroneous constructions of the Constitution that ever was adopted or proposed by any man in this country. He places it upon the ground that this road is absolutely necessary to the defense and protection of the nation, and to repel invasion. Sir, if it be absolutely necessary and indispensable, there must be no other way by which we can protect the Pacific coast from invasion. Now, sir, I say that there is another mode. I say that there is a clear constitutional mode by which it may be done. And what is that? It is to raise an army and provide a fleet, and send them round there—to raise an army, if you please, of half a million men, or a million men. That would be constitutional. And there being one way in which this can be done, I say that it is neither absolutely necessary nor indispensable to build such a road for such a purpose; and therefore, in my judgment, the grounds upon which the President places this subject cannot be sustained.

These, sir, are my views, very briefly expressed. I concur with the President, that a strict construction of the delegated powers of this Government is the only safe and true theory of the Government, and I am sorry he has not adhered to it in his recommendation; for I venture the opinion that there is not a man in this House who would claim this power as absolutely necessary to our military defenses.

Mr. COBB. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, to provide that this subject shall be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and in the few remarks I have to make, I shall confine myself to the particular subject of the amendment.

If gentlemen will refer to that portion of the President's message which refers to this subject, they will find that he connects the subject of building a railroad to the Pacific with grants of the public lands to such persons as may be engaged in the building of that road; therefore, I contend that the committee which legitimately has jurisdiction over the public lands is the proper committee to which this portion of the message should be referred.

I shall not on this occasion undertake to defend the President for the view he has taken upon this subject; nor will I commit myself to-day in this House to the particular course I shall pursue. I stand thoroughly committed at home by sixty different speeches which I made to my constituents—in every one of which I took care to commit myself upon this subject. A large portion of my constituents believed, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] believes, that to adopt the views of the President would be to break down the land-marks of the Democratic party; but, sir, I sustained the sentiments advanced by the President in his inaugural, when he intimated that it might become necessary to grant a portion of the public lands. I submitted the question fully to my constituents, and discussed it in my humble way to my own satisfaction, if not to the satisfaction of all who heard me.

Now, sir, I am not going to make an issue with the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] who thinks it important that this subject should be transferred from the legitimate standing committee, as I hold, to a select committee of thirteen, composed of men of talent, whose opinions shall command the admiration of the country. Sir, there are legitimate standing committees of this House, formed by the Speaker of the House; and whether their reports will be such as to command as much weight as those of the committee which the gentleman from Missouri desires to raise, I will not undertake to say. Sufficient is it for me, on this occasion, to confine myself to the question of reference alone.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, as a friend of the Pacific railroad, and believing that the Government has power under the Constitution to construct such a road for military and other purposes, I desire that this measure shall be referred to a committee so composed that the majority shall be its known friends; and for this reason I am decidedly opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, and in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri. How the Committee on Public Lands is constituted I know not. I have no means of knowing that it is in favor of the measure. I desire that it shall go to a committee known to be in favor of it—at least a majority of the committee understood to be in favor of it. Of course the minority should be represented upon the committee, and ably represented; but it should be such a committee as shall secure a favorable hearing, and a report in favor of some measure for the construction of this great work, one of the greatest enterprises, most necessary for the development of our resources and the preservation of the country, that can come before us at the present session of Congress.

I hope that the friends of the measure will vote down all propositions to refer it to any of the standing committees, and sustain the motion of the gentleman from Missouri. It is not a question particularly appropriate for the Committee on Military Affairs, even when it is granted that the authority to construct this road must rest mainly upon the power, under the Constitution, to construct military roads. It does not follow that because it is under this power it is to be constructed, that we may not appoint a select committee, with a view to the construction of a road for military purposes. It does not follow that the Committee on Military Affairs of this House have a right, under the rules, to control the will of the majority, to consider and to report on all measures touching the military affairs of the country. When a measure of great importance in any particular point of view, in regard to any interest or any arm of the public service, is before the country, it is entirely competent for us to commit it to a select committee; and on this very subject, although we may have no power under the Constitution, except that to build a road for military purposes, yet it is competent and legitimate for us to submit it to a select committee, as has been done heretofore. I hope that the precedent which has been established in two or three preceding Congresses, will be followed by this, and that the House will vote down the proposition to submit this question to any other than a select committee, constituted with special reference to bringing it before us in such manner as a measure of so much interest and importance to the country deserves.

Mr. COBB's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I move to amend by increasing the number of the committee to fifteen.

Mr. Chairman, I have entire confidence in the Committee on Roads and Canals, and in the ability and foresight of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands; but this is an important question—one in which every western man, and every man who lives in the valley of the Mississippi river feels a deep and an abiding interest, and should have a special reference. I undertake to say that the people of this Union will, whether for a military road or not, vote for direct taxation in order that a road may be constructed from here to the Pacific coast. The people of the North, and in many parts of the Union, have no knowledge of the feeling of the people of the West, and of the valley of the Mississippi, in relation to the construction of this road. In Illinois, and in my district, there is no question in which so much interest is felt as in a direct communication with the Pacific. It is a great national work; and, sir, if gentlemen can find no other power than to build a military road, why, then, let us build a military road. Every day only the more satisfies us that it is important for the protection of our people, who are constantly going to the Pacific coast. It is a matter of duty, of philanthropy; and every man who has a friend in the Far West ought to give his help to devise the ways and means for the construction of such a road.

I am for a strict construction of the Constitution; but, sir, in this question, if there is no other power, there certainly is power to construct a military road between this and the Pacific. And if there ever was a measure requiring the approbation and fostering care of this Government, it is the opening of a safe, speedy, and direct communication between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards.

I have no desire, Mr. Chairman, to make a speech on this or any other question; but I should feel that I was recreant to my duty, to my constituents, and the interests of the great Mississippi valley, if, on an occasion like this, I did not urge the appointment of a select committee.

Mr. SCOTT. I cannot permit the vote to be taken without saying a few words in favor of the very important amendment submitted by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS.] I come from a portion of this Union which feels a sincere, a deep, and an abiding interest in this question of a Pacific railroad. It has, in fact, been the idol of their hearts for a long while. The remarks made by the introducer of the amendment are correct; and I do not wish to see this all-important, all-absorbing, dearest object of every citizen of the Pacific slope referred to a committee which may possibly be overrun with other business, and unable to give it the attention which it deserves.

This is no ordinary question. We find that already the officers sent out by this Government have made surveys after surveys, which will occupy ten volumes. Maps upon maps fill these reports. Mr. Stevens, Mr. Gunnison, and many others, have marked out routes and submitted reports, and all these, I honestly believe, ought to have a fair, candid, and thorough investigation. We of the Pacific coast only ask justice from the Government. We are separated from you by a distance of six thousand miles. It takes us now some three or four weeks to reach here. I ask, then, loving you with that feeling which is deep in the bosom of every patriot, that, if this measure be constitutional, as the President believes it is, and the Representatives here are in favor of it, it shall not be put down by referring it to a committee that possibly may be so absorbed by other duties as not to give it the attention which it requires. I, as a representative of that State which is now looking with anxiety and solicitude to the action of this distinguished body upon this subject, ask and entreat you to vote for it, and I ask you, in the name of justice, in the name of right, and in the name of that rising and progressive country, to give us justice, and to give us an investigation, and we are willing to stand or fall upon the merits of the question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. COVODE. I move that the number of the committee be made nine, instead of thirteen. It is well known that a similar committee of thirteen was appointed during the last Congress. A smaller committee may be more efficient in transacting this important business. The President has recommended in his annual message, and has pledged himself to this Pacific railroad policy. In my opinion, the Government cannot do much longer without such a railroad. The Mormon question is to be tested, which will demonstrate to this country the necessity of communication with the interior and with the Pacific ocean by rail. If we had had a Pacific railroad, or roads, by the way of Salt Lake valley, we should have had no difficulty with this Mormon question. It may now cost the Government more to subdue the rebellion in that Territory than would build the entire road.

There is another consideration, sir. We may have difficulties upon the Pacific coast. The time is not very remote when our people upon that coast will be able to better themselves, if we afford them no reasonable accommodations. They have already threatened that unless we carry out our pledges to them, in good faith, we cannot expect to retain connection with them. Suppose, too, the Pacific coast should be invaded: could this Government repel an invasion there at less expense than it would cost to build two or three railroads? Suppose a rebellion should break out upon that coast: could our Government subdue it for what it would cost to build a railroad? And does any person suppose for a moment, that if we were provided with such a communication with the Pacific, there would be any difficulty of that kind.

The President's message has been published in London, and commented upon by the press. The Morning Post notices it in regard to a railroad to the Pacific across our territory. They have taken up the subject in England, and they are in favor of building a railroad to the Pacific through their own territory, north of ours. It is admitted by the writer in the Morning Post, that as soon as the road is constructed, it will be the great highway from England to China, and they do not want us to get the entire control of it. Therefore they are moving in England in favor of a railroad through their own territory. This writer says:

"It must be obvious to the most superficial understanding that the opening of any interoceanic line through the territory of the United States would effect as great a revolution in the trade of the world as that which was brought about by the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope route to India and to other countries in the East. The trade of China, Japan, and of regions comparatively unknown, would be impelled to the Pacific terminus of the railroad, whence it would be carried to the great Atlantic ports, to be afterwards distributed over America and Europe. Hong Kong, Shanghai, Canton, and other marts of Chinese trade, would be brought by steam within a few days' distance of the great American emporium which would spring up on the coast of the Pacific. If a facility of this kind existed, the most important and lucrative trade in the world would fall into the hands of the people of the United States, and the long voyages round the Cape, or the Horn, would rarely be undertaken for any purpose of commercial gain."

I am aware that the report of the minority of the committee appointed by the last Congress upon this measure was unfavorable to it, and it has carried abroad the impression that the route is not practicable. But the surveys made and reported, and recent surveys made which have not been reported, I have been informed, would satisfy any gentleman experienced in building railroads, that a road by the valley of the Platte is perfectly practicable. I am in favor of the southern route, also; but it is by the route of the valley of the Platte that the Government is to be enabled to control this rebellion in the interior.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I think this question is of too much importance to be disposed of by a few minutes debate. But as it is the desire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to get a vote upon the resolutions, and thus commit the President's message to the various committees, I will not insist upon a more extended debate. I rise, therefore, barely to say that I agree fully with the gentleman from Missouri, in the importance of this matter. I believe we ought to have a select committee, and that that select committee should be composed of the first men in this body; and at the same time, I disagree with the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb,] in supposing that it is not necessary, in forming a committee upon this subject, to distinguish that committee by selecting the ablest men in our body. It has already become a common remark, that when a matter of great importance is committed to some of our committees, it sleeps there—that they have not the time to devote to it. As remarked by the gentleman from California, none of the standing committees of this House could possibly examine the various reports made upon these various routes.

I agree with the President, not only that we have the power, but that it is our duty, to construct the road from our western States to the Pacific Territories. And I further say, that we would save the entire expense of that road in our present conflict with the Mormons in Utah. It is therefore a matter of economy, and not only one within the strict letter of the Constitution, but one which duty to our Territories and to our entire country demands. Without reference to any of the routes, north or south, or to the middle route, I say this is a measure which will do more to check the filibustering spirit of which we have heard so much for two or three days, than anything else. We have already expended vast sums in protecting the isthmus route, while we have been neglecting our own inland route. The subject, therefore, is of vast importance; and I hope the committee will not overlook its importance, and will allow us a committee of thirteen, who may thoroughly investigate and report upon it to the country.

Mr. SEWARD moved that the committee rise.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SEWARD and J. GLANCY JONES were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 36.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. BOCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the President's annual message, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PROPOSITION TO ADJOURN OVER.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. COX called for the yeas and nays, but afterwards withdrew the call.

Mr. DEWART. I renew the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 135; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Burlingame, Caskie, Burton, Craigie, Davis, of Maryland, Edmundson, Faulkner, Florence, Keitt, Landy, Letcher, Macley, Mason, Miles, Phillips, Rutlin, Miles Taylor, Elihu B. Washburne, and White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bockock, Bowie, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemons, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Goodwin, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hatch, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Leach, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Milson, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Seales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, William Smith, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippie, Walton, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Whiteley, Wilson, and Wortendyke—135.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

Pending the call,

Mr. TRIPPE stated that his colleague, Mr. HILL, had been confined to his room by sickness for the last few days.

Mr. MORGAN said: I am requested to announce that my colleague, Mr. SPINNER, was summoned home this morning by the death of a member of his family. I will also state that another colleague, Mr. PARKER, is still confined at home by the severe illness of his wife.

Mr. GROW stated that Mr. FENTON was confined to his room by sickness.

And then, on motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, the House (at twenty minutes past four o'clock) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 15, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE D. CUMMINS, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to have the Journal corrected in regard to the reference of the papers in the case of John C. Rives. They should have been referred to the regular committee of the House, and not to the select committee.

The correction was made.

NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up a joint resolution which came here several days ago from the Senate, entitled "A resolution to extend the operation of the act approved January 16, 1857, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.''" If gentlemen on the other side of the House, or on this side of the House, will allow me a word or two in explanation of the resolution, I think there will not be any objection made to it from any quarter.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the resolution that was passed by the Senate and sent to the House yesterday, authorizing the President of the United States, without the action of courts of inquiry, to nominate any of these dropped officers for restoration to the active list. That will be considered hereafter; and when I get an opportunity I will make a motion to have it referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. This is a different resolution. This is one that was passed several days ago, and sent to this House. The whole effect of it is this: an act was passed at the last session of Congress, authorizing officers of the Navy who had been affected by the naval retiring board, to apply within one year to a court of inquiry and have their cases examined on the question of their moral, physical, intellectual, and professional fitness. And the action of such courts of inquiry, when approved by the President, was to be the ground on which the President might nominate any such men for restoration to the active-service list. But all such restorations were to take place within one year, and not after.

Now we do not know what is going on in secret session in the Senate. Not only is it not parliamentary to speak of it here, but it is not admissible that any member of the Senate should inform us of what was going on in secret session. But this we know—that the courts have acted on the cases of a great many officers; the President has made nominations to the Senate; and these nominations have not been acted on by the Senate. Now, it is fair to presume that the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate are considering the action of the courts of inquiry in these cases.

This is the last day upon which anything can be done, under the act of last session. Unless this joint resolution be passed, all the cases that have been acted upon by the courts, and have been sent to the Senate, and are under consideration by the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate, will be cut off from any chance of restoration. The President will be unable, under the act of last session, to restore any man that may have been recommended for restoration to the active list.

That act was approved the 17th day of January, 1857. Its whole operation was limited to the time of one year. To-morrow the year expires. Therefore I say, that unless this joint resolution be passed to-day, everything that has been done by these courts of inquiry, and that has not been examined by the Senate committee, and acted upon by the Senate itself, will fall utterly ineffective and inoperative. I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the House that this joint resolution be now taken up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire if this is before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bockock] if this is the resolution to which the Senate adopted an amendment, on the motion of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BOCKOCK. No, sir; it is not. I am very glad to answer that question; and if anybody else has any difficulty in regard to the subject, I shall be very glad to answer him. This is not that resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I should rather this would take the regular course, and come up at the proper time.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman from Tennessee will allow me to say to him that there is a case now before the courts of inquiry which has occupied the attention of that court for one week; and unless this resolution pass to-day, that court of inquiry will be disbanded, and will be prevented from continuing even the consideration of the case which they are now considering and prosecuting.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understood that the naval officers themselves had asked for a retiring board. They were willing to take their chances to be retired, dropped, furloughed, or anything else, or their chances of promotion; and now, instead of the effect of that board being to decrease the number of officers, we find that its effect is to increase the number.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman allow the resolution to be read for information?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Certainly.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I object to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

APPOINTMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to what I suppose to be a question of privilege. I am instructed by the committee appointed to investigate the facts and circumstances attending the sale of the Fort Snelling military reservation, to report a resolution asking the House to authorize them to employ a stenographer.

Mr. BOCOCK. I wish to say that the gentleman over the way [Mr. Lovejoy] did not rise from his seat and object to the joint resolution which I asked to call up; and I submit, therefore, that it was not an objection which the Chair could recognize.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker certainly understood the gentleman from Illinois to rise in his place and object.

Mr. BURNETT. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed to investigate the facts and circumstances attending the sale of the military reservation at Fort Snelling, be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ a competent stenographer, at a reasonable compensation, for such length of time as the committee may require his services.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I think that is introducing a new system of expense.

Mr. BURNETT. With the permission of the House, I will state that, from what we have been informed, we shall find it impossible to take, by the ordinary mode, the evidence that will come before us. We cannot do justice to all parties in this case, I am satisfied, unless the House will give us authority to employ a stenographer, so that we may report all the facts as they are given in evidence by the witnesses.

As a general rule, I have been opposed not only to the employment of stenographers, but to the appointment of clerks for committees; but believing, in this case, that the public interest requires it, I have, in accordance with the unanimous recommendation of the committee, reported this resolution asking the House to give us this authority.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire if there are not ten or a dozen clerks employed in the Clerk's office—enrolling and engrossing clerks—who have nothing to do? for at this stage of the session there are no bills to be engrossed or enrolled.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose an objection is in order.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is, that the committee was authorized to report at any time.

Mr. BURNETT. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, that an ordinary clerk would not answer the purpose.

He will at once perceive that it is impossible for any man, unless he is a stenographer, unless he is a regular reporter, to take down the testimony of witnesses correctly and fully. If, therefore, the investigation is to go on, and the House desires to be put in possession of all the facts detailed by the witnesses, they should give us the aid of the services of a stenographer, which are absolutely necessary. I call for the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise for information. I suppose this committee has power to report at pleasure upon all matters referred to them; but I suppose the committee have no power to report at any moment, as a matter of right, in reference to matters of their convenience, such as the employment of a stenographer or clerk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the objection of the gentleman from Virginia came too late anyhow. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] was heard in favor of the resolution, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] in opposition to it, before the question was made by the gentleman from Virginia that the committee had not the right to make the report.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will remark that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] made opposition to the ruling of the Chair, or to the resolution itself, and rather threw me off my guard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee to be addressed as against the merits of the resolution itself, and not to any question of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The purpose for which I rose was to suggest that there are clerks in the pay of the House who might be employed for this purpose.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The resolution was first read for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky rose in his place and stated that he desired to submit a report, which he supposed was a privileged report.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Exactly. The gentleman stated that it was a privileged report, and I understood the Chair to receive it as a privileged report. I now raise the question that it is not a report privileged in its character.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman raised the question after the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Tennessee had spoken upon the resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That is very true. The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. BURNETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, demanded the yeas and nays upon the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO A MEMBER.

On motion of Mr. RICAUD, it was Ordered, That Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland, have leave to be absent from the sessions of the House from time to time, as may be necessary for him, to attend to the taking of testimony in the matter of his contested election.

CASE OF JUDGE WATROUS.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses on oath in relation to the charges made against John C. Watrous, judge of the United States court for the western district of the State of Texas.

PROPOSITION TO ADJOURN OVER.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 114; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Barksdale, Bennett, Blair, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burlingame, Burnett, Burroughs, John B. So the motion was disagreed to.

Pending the call,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, stated that his colleague, Mr. ATKINS, was detained at home by indisposition.

Mr. CRAGIN stated that his colleague, Mr. TAPPAN, was detained at home by the illness of a member of his family.

Mr. HICKMAN stated that his colleague, Mr. PHILLIPS, had been forced this morning to leave the city for his home.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, said that if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he would have voted in the negative.

PASSAGE OF THE TARIFF OF 1857.

Mr. STANTON. I offer the following resolutions:

Whereas a published report of a committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Middlesex Manufacturing Company, in the State of Massachusetts, alleges that said company paid $87,000 to secure the passage of the tariff of 1857, and after charging that $8,000 of this sum was disbursed by the New York house for printing, further alleges that no satisfactory explanation has yet been afforded of the application of the balance; and whereas said charges tend very seriously to prejudice the reputation and character of the members of this House who were members of the last Congress, and participated in the passage of the tariff of 1857: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate said charge, and to inquire whether any member or officer of this House received any part of said sum; and that said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That if said committee shall find that any part of said sum was paid to, or for the use or benefit, either directly or indirectly, of any member or officer of this House, that said committee shall present specific charges against the party so charged.

Resolved, That if any such charges shall be presented by said committee, another committee of five shall be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the charges so presented; and the parties so charged shall have notice of the times and places of the meetings of said committee, and the right to be present at the taking of the evidence against them, and to cross-examine the witnesses against them, and have process to compel the attendance of witnesses in their defense.

Mr. Speaker, I have delayed the offering of these resolutions for some time longer than I should have done, in the expectation that some gentleman who favored the passage of the tariff of 1857 would have asked for this investigation. It has not been done, however. And this information has been presented in such a form as to seem to me to demand the notice of the House. It is not a mere newspaper rumor, but the report of a committee appointed by a moneyed corporation to investigate its affairs and the disbursement of its funds. That report charges that this expenditure was made for the purpose of affecting the legislation of the House. It is not proper for me now to express any opinion as to whether those who make this charge are doing it for the purpose of covering up their own delinquency, or whether it is true in point of fact; and if true, whether the money was paid to members of the House, or whether it was paid in other modes to influence the action of the House. I regard it as being sufficiently authentic to require this investigation.

Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that these resolutions differ somewhat from the ordinary course pursued in inquiries of this description; though, really, inquiries of this description are not very common. In the resolution raising the committee of inquiry, I propose to direct the mode of proceeding upon the coming in of the report of the committee. I do so for this reason: I think, if the committee is to be raised at all, it is indispensable that that committee should know what disposition is to be made of its report, what ac-

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 20.

tion is to be had on it for the purpose of governing it in its proceedings. If the House is to act on the testimony given before that committee, then it becomes the imperative duty of the committee, if any member or officer of the House is charged, to give notice to the party so charged of what the evidence is, and to give him an opportunity of bringing evidence for the purpose of exculpating himself from the charge.

Now, sir, I do not believe that any committee of this House can properly combine the functions of a grand and petit jury; for, sir, if the committee charged with the investigation is to inquire generally whether crimes and offenses have been committed, is compelled to give notice to the parties charged, whenever testimony is brought before the committee implicating them, it is at once to give notice to those parties, and to other parties, what line of investigation the committee is pursuing, and to put them upon the qui vive, if you please, for the purpose of preventing a successful termination of the labors of the committee. They will operate out of doors to counteract the proceedings of the committee, and use influences to prevent the committee from getting the testimony necessary for the fullest and most effectual investigation. It is indispensable to the successful prosecution of an inquiry of this kind, where no person is specifically charged, that the proceedings of the committee originally instituted to investigate it should be kept secret. The committee ought to have the privilege of going into their room, of locking their door, and preventing the world from knowing who is implicated by the testimony which is submitted to them, so that they may thereby prevent outside influences from operating to prevent them from prosecuting their labors to a successful issue.

I think it is important that this committee should know, before it enters upon the discharge of its duties, whether it is the intention of the House to act upon the testimony taken by it, and to censure, expel, or punish, in whatever manner it may see proper, any person who may be charged; because, upon that would depend, essentially, the course the committee would take in the prosecution of their investigation.

I am perfectly aware that there is no precedent for the course of proceeding I propose, and I am also aware that there is no precedent against it, except in the investigation had before the last House of Representatives. Sir, there has been no other investigation before the American Congress predicated upon a general charge, without naming the person who is to be affected by the charge. In that consists the difference between this and the other charges heretofore made, and tried before the House. Where a resolution charges a member or officer of the House, by name, there is no difficulty in the course of proceeding. There the resolution adopted by the House stands for an indictment, and the committee appointed for the purpose of investigating that charge, performs the functions of a petit jury, and the person charged, of course, has the right to notice of all times and places of meetings of the committee, to be present to hear the testimony against him, and to have process to compel the attendance of witnesses in his favor, and the privilege of cross-examination. There is, therefore, no difficulty in a case where a member is named in the resolution. But there is no instance, except that of the last Congress, where a general resolution was introduced, based upon rumors that affected the whole body without naming any individual, where the member has been dealt with upon the testimony taken before such a committee.

I regard it a matter of very great importance, as a mere matter of precedent, that this question should be settled rightly. I claim that the proceedings of the committee of the last Congress cannot be regarded as setting a precedent, on account of the peculiar circumstances in which they were placed. I have no fault to find with the course they pursued under the circumstances. They were appointed near the close of the Congress. No other course was practicable, without defeating the ends of the investigation. They therefore were compelled, in their deliberations, to combine the functions of a grand and petit jury, to inquire into the charge, and also to report the testimony, and a resolution of expulsion.

Sir, that investigation, and the matters connected with it, satisfy me that the peculiar circumstances of that case ought not to be brought into a precedent for the future action of Congress. I will advert to some few circumstances to show how it operated. The committee employed a stenographer; they took down the testimony of the witnesses as it was delivered in the committee; it was written out by the stenographer; and when it was written out, the witnesses had the opportunity of reading the testimony, and, of course, of correcting it—it was right that it should be so, and it ought not to be otherwise; but, sir, the party to be affected by this testimony was not present when the oral evidence was given, and never saw that part of the evidence reduced to writing, and which was stricken out before it was submitted to the party charged. He was not furnished with the facilities which oral testimony would have furnished for the contradiction of witnesses. It was a matter of necessity. You recollect difficulties grew up in the progress of the investigation, in consequence of corrections being made in the testimony, it being disclosed that oral testimony had been given before the committee which never was submitted to the party charged with the offense. Now, it is easy to see that a party may be deeply prejudiced—not having the witnesses before him, and the testimony taken in his presence upon which he is to be tried—by an opportunity being given to the witnesses to correct their testimony, the party to be affected by it having no opportunity of knowing what it is until it has been corrected and all contradictions effaced.

Now, sir, I take it for granted that this House will not desire to combine the functions of a grand and petit jury in one committee. If they do not, what is to be done? One of two courses must be pursued: either the party must be tried at the bar of the House, and all the testimony taken de novo orally before the whole House; or else the testimony taken by a committee appointed for that purpose must be reported to the House, and the party be tried by the House upon that testimony. I know it was said at the last Congress that the party was tried by the House, that his trial was in the House; but, sir, what lawyer, or what man of ordinary intelligence, does not know that the essential part of a trial is the evidence? How can it be said that a man is tried before the House when no witnesses are examined before the House; when all the testimony is taken elsewhere; when he can know nothing of what transpired in the committee room? I assume, although it may not be impracticable absolutely to try a party and to produce the evidence against him at the bar of the House, yet that it is so exceedingly inconvenient that it could never be extensively resorted to. Any other course is in plain violation of that constitutional provision—a provision in the Constitution of the United States, as well, perhaps, as in the constitution of every State in the Confederacy—that every party charged with an offense shall be entitled to be tried, and to have his accusers and the witnesses brought before him face to face. It will not do for gentlemen to seek to escape this plain provision by saying that the House has no power to inflict any common-law punishment upon the offender. Why, sir, the condemnation which this House pronounces upon one of its members is worse than death. There is no honorable man who would not rather suffer death than a condemnation for bribery at the hands of the House of Representatives of the United States.

I submit, therefore, that it is due to any party who may be charged, that he shall have all the privileges guaranteed to the meanest criminal arraigned for the most trivial offense in the lowest court in any State of the Confederacy. For this reason, and with a view to enlighten the committee as to what is to be the further action of the House, I offer these resolutions.

Mr. WHITELEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio if this House has the power to try one of its members, against whom, as a member of the last House, there is a charge of corruption?

Mr. STANTON. I take it for granted that this is one among the numerous questions that may be considered by this House. I should, however, strongly incline to the opinion that if a member of the House were convicted of bribery, he would be rendered ineligible to hold a seat on this floor. That is my present impression, and I should be likely to vote on that impression. Still, I am open to conviction. At all events, the question is certainly not so clearly the other way as to justify this House in refusing any investigation. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to occupy the attention of the House longer, or to engage in any general debate; nor have I any desire to prevent any gentleman who desires to move an amendment to the resolutions, or to resist the adoption of them altogether from doing so; therefore I do not demand the previous question, but submit the resolutions to the House.

Mr. BURLINGAME. Inasmuch as the firm whose transactions are to be inquired into, under the resolutions that have just been offered by the gentleman from Ohio, had its chief establishment in the State which I, in part, represent, a few words from me may not be deemed inappropriate. As a general rule, Mr. Speaker, I would, as a member of this House, be against taking cognizance of any transaction that did not occur in the presence of the House or in the presence of the Senate, or so near them as to interrupt the deliberations of Congress. I would not, sir, desire to enlarge the powers of this House. I would not have the House take jurisdiction of matters which might more properly be taken charge of and investigated by other tribunals established under law for the purpose of securing to the citizen of the country his rights. But in this case, sir, I would depart from this general rule of the policy which I would establish for my own guidance. So many charges have been made—with what motives and for what purpose I will not undertake to intimate—by individuals and by partisan presses, so many charges of a grave character have been made, that it seems to me that the House will consult its dignity as well as its honor, by adopting those resolutions.

Of the charge found by an investigating committee, on the books of Lawrence, Stone & Co., I know nothing save what I have seen in the newspapers. I do not know by whom that charge was made, or for what purpose it was made. But it seems to have been found on their books by an investigating committee.

I know that that committee made no charge, even by innuendo, against this House, or any member of it; but, I say, charges of a grave character have been made by responsible persons; and because they have been made, I, for one, speaking as one of the representatives of Massachusetts, (and I think I may speak for all of my colleagues,) welcome that resolution of inquiry and investigation, and I do hope that this matter may be probed to the bottom. But I take occasion here to say—and I believe the heart of every member of the House will respond to what I say—that I do not believe that the hands of any member of the House have been stained by the money of Lawrence, Stone & Co. I do not wish to deepen or to darken the cloud that already rests on that house. No, sir; the name of the senior partner of that house is one which has stood, and which stands to-day, because of the noble men who are dead, who have borne it, and because of the noble men who yet live who bear it—has stood as the very synonym of mercantile integrity and honor. That name will live perpetually in the history of the great cities which bear it, east and west, forever and forever. And my hope is, that this investigation will disclose that the senior member of that firm has been more overtaken by misfortune and by folly, than by any intentional crime; but whatever he may have done, whatever may have been his motive, although I have known him somewhat in other days, although I have been proud to esteem him as a friend, I would not shield him, I would not improperly remove the dark cloud of suspicion that rests upon his name; nor would I attempt to shield any member of this House. I say again, that I am for the resolution. It seems to be of a large scope. It seems to complicate many affairs. I do not know that it might not be improved by amendment; but, after all, I am for the substance of it. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] in what he said as to the manner in which this investigation should be conducted. It should be conducted in such a way as that no bounty should be paid to informers; no inducements should be offered to outsiders, to malignant, bitter men, who, for the sake of gratifying their malice and malevolence, may seek an opportunity of a committee of investigation and inquiry of this House, to fix upon a man a stain which the gentleman from Ohio says is worse than death.

I say, I trust that the committee will so conduct the investigation as not to permit these men to accomplish their private malevolence and malice. I do not know that it is necessary for me at the present time to say more; and with these remarks and statements of the purposes which induce me to support the resolutions, I take my seat.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the application for an investigation has been met by a gentleman from the Commonwealth where the occurrences arose, with a proper and becoming spirit. Whether there are adequate grounds presented, upon which this House ought to condescend to investigate the charge against the honor of its members, is a question which I do not now design to discuss. The resolutions of inquiry shall have my vote. The gentleman who proposed them holds upon this subject a position which, perhaps, very few others in the House hold. He is so fortunate as to have secured himself, by his course on the tariff bills of the last session, from the insolent insinuations of a vituperative and lying press—whether here or elsewhere, from which, perhaps, no other member can escape; for I believe no one of the several tariff bills before the House during the last session was so fortunate as to receive his support—neither that which was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] not now in the House, nor that other bill, reported by my honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] who is here upon the other side of the House; nor that third bill, which was passed, and which corresponded with neither of the first bills in its general provisions, but which did correspond with both of those bills in that one provision, in which Lawrence, Stone & Co. were concerned, relative to the duty upon wool, which bill originated neither in any committee in this House, nor with any member of this House, but with a joint committee of conference of the two Houses as the result of their consultation in the last hours of the session, and was passed by this House and the Senate without the opportunity of deliberate discussion in either House. But in all three of these bills, Mr. Speaker, the provision relative to the removal of the duty on wool was more or less in accordance with the views of the gentlemen who are to be the subjects of this investigation. The bill adopted by the House was one which came from the committee of conference, and I have thought it proper, in view of the statements of newspapers, which, under other circumstances, I would never have condescended for an instant to notice, to show how, by suppressing a part of the truth, they can commit as much a libel as if they had affirmatively imputed corruption; for, sir, we have had the paper of the Government here publishing the votes of gentlemen who voted for the bill which passed the House, conveying the insolent and false innuendo, that among them were to be found the men who received the money of Lawrence, Stone & Co., when bills with analogous provisions, equally favorable to the interest of the parties who are supposed to be tempters and betrayers of the honor of the House, emanating from and voted for by other members of the House, are passed over in silence.

But, sir, there is no suggestion in that paper that can throw a suspicion upon any member of this House demanding investigation. Now, sir, there is no man who holds the comments of the political press of the country in more utter contempt than I do. I stand in terror of no press, nor any combination of them. I hold their shameless libels in such utter contempt that, though they should point at me even personally their imputations, I should take no notice of them except to carry them before a grand jury, on an indictment for the libel which they may have promulgated. Sir, when charges are made simply through the newspaper press, I do not hold it worthy the dignity of this House to make them the ground of an investigation. I hold that my reputation, and the reputation of every member of this House, counting myself the lowest and humblest, is more than enough to look in the face the whole combined press of the country. Sir, there is no press which I recognize anywhere within the limits of the United States, whose unsupported charge within its editorial columns can even put me upon my defense.

But, sir, there is a different case now presented to this House—one which, perhaps, demands the investigation of the House. There is a statement from gentlemen known in the country, of responsible character, who have investigated the books of one of the merchant princes of this country, that these books show $87,000 to have been used for the purpose of procuring the passage of the last tariff act. That statement, made over responsible names, is the foundation for the application which has been made by the gentleman from Ohio for an investigation.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the statement does not say how the money was employed. It does not include the presumption that a jurist sitting on a case would be bound to make a case from; because there are thousands of proper and legitimate modes in which money may be used to secure the passage of measures through Congress. It may be employed to pay the traveling expenses of agents. It may be employed to pay for publications. It may be employed in arguments honorably presented before committees. It may be employed in the way which this House refused, at the last session of Congress, to forbid, and which, therefore, is not illegal; for the last House refused, by a large vote, to pass an eminently honest and necessary measure, which you, Mr. Speaker, had the honor to propose, and which that House has the responsibility of defeating—a bill which made it criminal for any man employed for pay as an agent for any measure, public or private, before Congress, to approach any member upon the subject without first notifying such member that he was a paid agent. But, sir, this House having refused to adopt that wise, conservative measure, this also remains a legal mode of procuring legislation, and the $87,000 may have been employed in that way. The agents employed may have whispered into the ears of members suggestions under the guise of disinterested advice. It may be that this money may have been employed in some one of these legal, though dangerous modes, without attaching dishonor to any member of the House.

But let the investigation come. And, sir, if it should be found again that peculiar influence has done more than was shown to be the general mode of its operation in the committee on which you were at the last Congress; if it should be found to have done anything more than to have gone into the hands of agents, and those who lyngly boasted their influence over members they dared not approach, and thus got up a reputation in the country of the corruption of Congress; if it should appear that any money has touched the palm of any member, then let him die the death of character.

But the point to which I chiefly rose is the shape of the resolutions of the honorable member from Ohio. He means, doubtless, that this investigation shall be effectual; but his resolutions prevent the possibility of the accomplishment of that result. Why, sir, the gentleman has hampered the great inquest of the country that will be charged to perform a lustration for the purity of this great central seat of its sovereignty with many of the forms and technicalities and delays of the ordinary judicial process of the country. Sir, I would have them saved that. I want it to be a free investigation; I want to have no technical difficulties interposed; I want to have no difficulties interposed which consume the time, weary the patience, prevent the judgment of the House, and fritter it away in minute details of order and precedent. I, sir, am for adopting the precedent and the wise precedent that this House set at the last session, which accomplished results that every man here ought to be grateful for; which instituted an inquiry which oppressed no man's rights, which hurt no man's character unjustly, which dealt with men tenderly and carefully, which brought the guilty to punishment, and drove them to confess their guilt, by resigning their seats in the face of the investigation, the results of which were before the House; and touching the other gentleman, who was not condemned, it shows that investigation fairly presented the merits of the case, that the House dealt as it ought to deal where there is a doubt about the evidence, and gave the party the benefit of the doubt, and let him go free, untarnished. Sir, in behalf of the committee that made that investigation, and in behalf of the House that cast the votes which attained those results, I present my protest against the virtual condemnation which this House is called on to pass upon their proceedings, as well as their results, by the adoption of the complicated machinery of technicality which is sought now to be interposed; not that the gentleman has that purpose, but which must tend directly to trip up the steps of blind justice, as it is attempting to fumble its way in the dark, to the discovery of the fountains of corruption.
